UMass heads to Maryland to face Terrapins

Second round loss in NCAA tourney still fresh in the mind's of the Minutemen

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Less than eight months ago, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team stood on the sidelines of the Kansas Coliseum dejected. After an impressive 28–7 season, the Minutemen made their second consecutive early exit from the NCAA tournament with an 95–87 loss to Maryland.

When the Minutemen take the floor at 2 p.m. tomorrow afternoon at the Baltimore Civic Center, that loss will be fresh in their minds.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari downplayed the idea of revenge playing a factor.

"I don't think [revenge is a factor]," Calipari said. "We're just going to play basketball."

Their short lived tournament run is sticking in the minds of the players however.

"We're looking forward to the game against Maryland," said sophomore Marcus Camby before the season started. "They are as jacked up as we are. That game is more important to us than the Arkansas game."

The one player that shined for the Minutemen in the loss a year ago is questionable for the game. Sophomore All- America Marcus Camby, who scored 32 points and grabbed 10 rebounds against Maryland last year, has had his practice limited because he has been struggling with an illness. Whether or not he plays will be a game time decision.

"It hurts us a lot if you take him out of our line up," Calipari said. "That's a lot of blocked shots and put stick back plays. It hurts us."

If he does not play, it will negate the much anticipated rematch between Camby and fellow sophomore center Joe Smith.

> "They are as jacked up as we are. That game is more important to us than the Arkansas game."

Smith, who was the National Freshman of the Year last year, has picked up where he left off so far this season. He leads the Terrapins in scoring, averaging 27.3 points and nine rebounds per game.

Despite his impressive numbers on the national stage in the NCAAs, Smith was outplayed by the less heralded Camby. So while revenge may be on the mind of the Minutemen because of the loss, Smith's battle may be more of a personal one.

Calipari knows that the matchup in the pivot could be crucial.

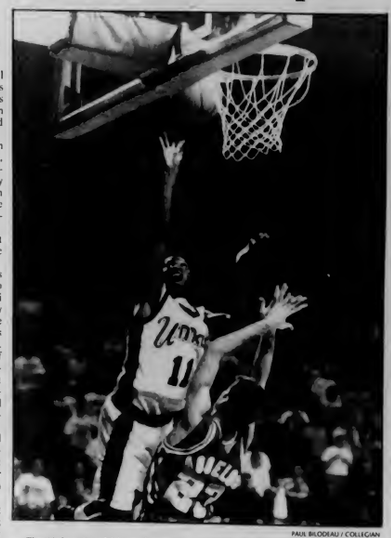
"Joe is good, and he's gotten better, and so has Marcus," Calipari said. "Marcus was very active on the offensive glass last year. That's where he scored most of his points. That's what we have to get out of him and that's what he's got to continue to do. I'm hoping against Maryland that he has the kind of outing he had the last time we played them. It's going to be hard to duplicate obviously."

The undercard in the personal rivalry department is at the small-forward position. Cousins Donta Bright and Keith Booth will resume their friendly rivalry when they battle each other tomorrow as well.

Booth is the Terps second leading rebounder (6.0) and fourth leading scorer (10.7). Bright trails only Roe in scoring for the Minutemen with a 16.3 ppg scoring average, and is fourth in rebounding at 5.6 rpg.

"It's a hard game because it's hard for Donta," Calipari said of the Maryland native. "Going back home a lot of times you try to do too much. You don't know what to expect from Donta."

In addition to Bright, the game will also be a homecoming for UMass sub Ted Cottrell who was the Mr. Basketball in his senior year of high school.



PAUL BILODEAU / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will be looking for revenge when it faces up against the Maryland Terrapins tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Both teams enter the game at 2–1. The Terrapins beat Chaminade and Utah, before being upset by Arizona State in the Maui Classic.

"We're 2–1, and I'm happy with that," Calipari said. "If you had told me that we'd be 2–1 at this point in the season, I'd say good, wake me up when it's over. We've done some things and made some good strides. We just have to keep it going."

For the third straight game, the Minutemen will be on national television. They were on ESPN and ESPN2 in the first two games, but will be on ABC tomorrow.

Minutewomen set to face Detroit

UMass is looking for its first win of the season tomorrow

By Condice Flemming
Collegian Staff

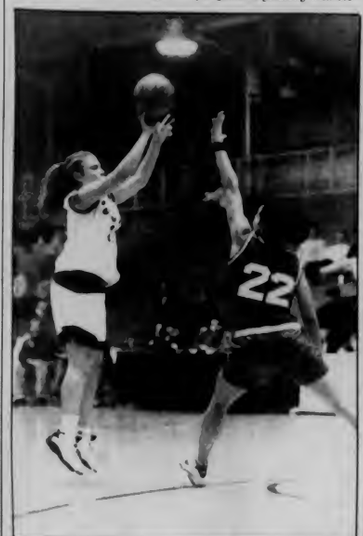
The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will be looking for its first win of the young season when the Minutewomen face Detroit tomorrow afternoon in the first ever meeting between the two teams.

UMass has started out the season with four losses, all on the road. The Titans are 2–2, as of press time, but they have a game against Central Michigan tonight.

Detroit returns all five starters from last year's 15–13 squad which finished tied for second (8–4) in the Midwestern Collegiate Conference.

"They are a good, solid team," said UMass Coach Joanie O'Brien. "They have been shooting the ball pretty well from the perimeter. It will be a good test."

Junior Faith Cyr has been the leading scorer for the Titans so far this season averaging 16.0 points per game to go along with 8.3 rebounds.



COLLEGIAN FILE

Beth Kuzmeski and the Minutewomen basketball team will be trying to win their first game of the season against the Detroit Titans tomorrow in Michigan.

Against Kentucky, a team that defeated UMass in the Minutewomen's season opener, Cyr scored 19 points and snagged six rebounds. Against Northeastern Illinois Tuesday, she poured in a game-high 22 points and grabbed 11 boards.

Also leading the way for the Titans this season has been sophomore Autumn Rademacher. Against Northeastern Illinois, she scored 13 points, second only to Cyr's 22 points. She has averaged 12.8 points in the Titan's first four games. Senior Amira Danforth is another top returnee for the Titans. Last year, the 5-foot-5 guard averaged 13.3 points and 4.5 rebounds.

The Minutewomen, with the four game losing streak to open up the season, obviously have been struggling. Three of UMass' losses have been by more than 12 points. Against Eastern Michigan, the Minutewomen were up by 12 with just under five minutes to go in the game but ended up losing by one point, 56–55.

The most consistent performer for UMass during the four game slide has been junior Melissa Gurile. She scored a team-high 19 points in the heartbreaking loss to Eastern Michigan and was the team leader in rebounds against Kentucky (10) and Wake Forest (9). She's averaged 14.5 points and 7.0 rebounds in the four games.

Junior forward Octavia Thomas was the leading scorer against Wake Forest with 17 points. For the season so far, she's averaged 12.3 points and a team-high 7.8 rebounds.

If the Minutewomen are to win, they will need big plays from their big three: Gurile, Thomas and Crystal Carroll, who has been hampered by an ankle injury as of late.

"Melissa, Octavia and Crystal are going to have to take care of the middle," O'Brien said. "The three have to step it up inside."

UMass will also need strong games from its backcourt duo of Beth Kuzmeski and Sabriya Mitchell. Kuzmeski had her best game of the year against Kentucky in the opener when she scored 16 points, including four three pointers.

Minutemen to face Wildcats

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

It's never easy. Every weekend in Hockey East is a challenge.

The home-and-home series for the University of Massachusetts this weekend is one of the toughest it will face all year, squaring off against the University of New Hampshire (9–3–2).

Friday night the Minutemen (0–10–1) will travel to the JFK Coliseum in Portsmouth, NH. On Saturday, action returns to the William D. Mullins Center.

"This is yet another tough one in this conference. They are a solid all-around team," said Massachusetts Coach Joe Mallen. "No matter what our record is, we believe we have a shot to win every game."

UMass comes in with a 0–7 record in Hockey East, having dropped consecutive contests to Merrimack at home last weekend. The Minutemen fell 4–3 and 3–1 in games at the Mullins Center.

"Last weekend was disappointing, but we are letting people know that we are building a program here. We've made huge strides when you compare it to last season's losses to Merrimack (8–2 and 4–1)," Mallen said.

UNH (4–2–2 in HE) was ranked second in the pre-season HE coaches poll. After dropping two early season games to Maine, the Wildcats are in fourth place, just one point out of third. UNH picked up a 4–2 road victory Wednesday night over ECAC power Harvard.

"They are a veteran team with seven seniors. This will be a very tough battle for us. Playing against upperclassmen will show us where we stand," Mallen said.

In goal for the Minutemen on Friday night will be freshman Brian Regan, who sat out of both games against Merrimack. Regan has played in four games with a 4.65 goals against average and a save percentage of .877. Sophomores Dave Kilduff (5.63 GAA) and Rich Moriarty (4.02 GAA) have also seen action in net.

"We will continue to rotate our goalies as we feel things out. When we get that first win, we will run with that goalie," Mallen said. "They say the creme rises to the top, we will see if that happens with our goaltending situation."

A recurring problem for the Minutemen has been the first period. UMass fell behind Merrimack in both of last weekend's games and never recovered. UMass has been outscored 22–9 in first period's overall, including a 17–6 ratio in conference games.

"There has been a lack of concentration from the start during our games. Our guys need to focus on where they need to be for the start," Mallen said.

This year marks the fifth for UNH Coach Dick Umile. In his four seasons he has led the Wildcats to two NCAA appearances, including a trip to the quarterfinals last year. Umile was named 1991 HE Coach of the Year.

His 'Cats this season have been lead in scoring by Mike Sullivan (seven goals, 10 assists). Last season's top two scorers' Eric Flinton and Nick Poole have gotten off to slow starts but are always dangerous. Co-captain Kent Semidtke and Todd Hall lead a solid group of defensemen.

There is a three-way tie at the top of UMass' scoring charts. Warren Norris, Rob Bonneau (four goals and two assists each) and Blair Wagar (3–3) all have six points. Tom Sheehan and Chris Fawcett are next with two goals and three assists apiece.

Brian Corcoran will see his first action on defense for UMass. The 6-foot-2, 247 lbs. Corcoran saw his first season action at forward last Friday, but will be back at his customary position in this Friday's game.

"We want to get Brian's size in there in that small ice surface (JFK Coliseum). He can use his big body for us on the backline," Mallen said.

Opening face-off is 7 p.m. on both nights.

UMass looks to rebound against Rutgers

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

After being upset, the ability to quickly regain its footing is the mark of a truly great team.

Toppled from their eighth-year perch atop the New England Championships this past weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team will attempt to rebound, while they face a tough test, tomorrow afternoon against the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers.

"Rutgers has one of the better teams on the east coast," said UMass Coach Russ Yarworth. "They have some tremendous front line swimmers in Jeff Farschon, Tim Berlin and a couple of other kids. These are legitimate national-caliber athletes, so we'll have a tough time dealing with that."

The Minutemen hope to counter the Rutgers team with strong performances by UMass Co-Athlete of the Week Keith McLarty and Tim Milbert.

McLarty finished first at the New Englands in three events, the 200 yard backstroke, and the 200 yard and 400 yard individual medleys, setting a pair of UMass records along the way.

Milbert captured the 100 yard breaststroke in a time of 58.66. Milbert also took second and third place in the 200 yard breaststroke and 200 yard individual medley, respectively.

This stellar three day performance could have an adverse lagging effect on the team.

"This is one of those meets where we're prepared mentally and we're going to swim as hard as we can. But physically, we're going to be tired," Yarworth said. "We had a tough three day meet last weekend and we've been working really hard this week. We've been really cranking it out. We're going with our best lineup and we'll see what that brings for us. Swimming is a sport where you don't prepare for every contest. You try to go for peak performances and you can't peak at every contest."

While both UMass and Rutgers have strong front-line swimmers, it will come down to a matter of roster depth when it comes time to decide the winner.

"We might have a little more depth than them which is going to be our saving grace. We'll put the kids in the water. We'll swim our hearts out, and the team has more desire and determination than most teams I think, so they'll do alright."

The Minutemen encountered some troubles this past weekend at the New Englands, and hope to return to the winning track tomorrow at 3 p.m. in Boyden. There could be some fatigue, but expect the Minutemen to have this weekend well in their past by race time.

"These guys, they swam their hearts out last week," Yarworth said. "We want to win, but understand in this sport you can't focus on the individual wins. You don't want to be worried about winning too many battles, and then losing the war. We're looking towards the end of the year. The attitude, the determination, the discipline, the desire's all there."

Elders has no regrets about public remarks

By Lawrence L. Knutson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The foes of Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders' social views are celebrating her firing by President Clinton. But Elders, defiant to the end, said she does not regret saying school children should be taught about masturbation and suggested that her remarks were misinterpreted.

"People have taken a lot of things I've said in a most unusual way," she said Friday in a telephone interview from her home outside Washington.

Incoming House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who has repeatedly assailed Elders' views, called her "a remarkably destructive person" who has long deserved removal from office.

And Rep. Marge Roukema of New Jersey, the most senior Republican woman in the House, said, "Great! What took her so long?" after Clinton demanded and received Elders' resignation.

White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta said Clinton acted because Elders had ignored repeated warnings from administration officials to moderate her public statements. "This was one too many," he said.

He cited previous Elders statements in which she said the government should consider legalizing drugs, consider "teaching five-year olds to use condoms" and for saying that anti-abortion Catholics have "a love affair" with fetuses.

Her firing stemmed from her remarks Dec. 1 at a World AIDS Day conference in New York, when she was asked whether taboos about the public discussion of masturbation should be lifted.

Elders said, "As per your specific question in regard to masturbation, I think that is something that is a part of human sexuality and it's a part of something that perhaps should be taught. But we've not even taught our children the very basics. And I feel that we have tried ignorance for a very long time and it's time we try education."

Elders said on Friday she had intended to explain her belief that masturbation is a natural act that would have to be included in any comprehensive discussion about human sexuality. But she does not believe young people should be taught how to masturbate. "Heavens, no. That's not what I was trying to say. You can't teach people how to do that, just like you can't teach them how to have sex," she said.

"I don't regret what I said," she told The Associated Press. "I could have said it better."

Elders would not say whether she thought politics played a role in her firing. "I'm not enough of a politician to know the answer to that," she said.

Elders, who served in Clinton's Cabinet in Arkansas, pointedly refused to characterize her discussion with the president, although her resignation letter said she and Clinton still share a "strong mutual respect for each other."

In the interview, she said, "It was an honor for me to serve as surgeon general and without the president I would not have had that honor."

Elders said in her letter that she planned to return to Arkansas and speak out on social issues.

"In Arkansas, I always did the very best I knew how," she said in the interview. "It may not be the best somebody else could do, but it was my very best."

Study claims UMass has mishandled conflict

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A recent study concluded that conflict and demonstrations are mishandled at the University of Massachusetts and multiculturalism is overemphasized — perpetuating racism.

In the beginning of November, the Massachusetts Association of Scholars (MAS) released a study, entitled Turmoil and Tension at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst: History, Analysis and Recommended Solutions.

MAS is a 150-member affiliate of the National Association of Scholars.

Their 80-page report addresses the effect campus activism on the UMass campus has had on the choices administration has made in "preferential" hiring of faculty and recruitment of minority students.

The study reported on racial incidents that have taken place at UMass over the past decade, and the responses and repercussions from the administration.

They analyzed different incidents and responses, in relation to victims of different races.

They looked at a particular incident in the fall 1992 semester that took place in Washington Tower, and consequently spurred riots.

The incident involved Arlens Barosy, a Black Resident's Assistant. While enforcing an alcohol policy on a White male that was violating it, Barosy was attacked.

The administration referred to the attack as a racial incident, according to the MAS report.

In comparison, they brought forth the incident involving an attack made on Jason Nietupski, a White male.

Nietupski was returning to his Cance dormitory after spending the night studying, when he was attacked by several Black men. The administration refused to term the incident as one of a racial nature.

The report said that the administration's inconsistency in policy was responsible for such disparities, and quoted former Daily Collegian editor-in-chief Mike Morrisey as saying that "if the violence is Black on White at UMass, people are too scared to speak up."

The administration's policies and strategies came under fire throughout the entirety of the MAS report, as they noted the ineffectiveness of attempts to diversify the campus.

Chancellor David K. Scott issued a statement in reply to the report which said that "the campus climate mirrors the society as a whole, and like society in general we will continue to work to find ways to improve relations between different groups."

Scott said the report is currently being reviewed for factual correctness.

The MAS report states that multicultural programs, including special interest programs, floors, dormitories, classes and modes of curriculum have managed to segregate the campus and encourage violent forms of activism.

The MAS study claims that these programs segregate people into groups and emphasizes their differences rather than their similarities.

It says programs like Social Thought and Political Economy (STPEC), not only teach students to resolve conflict through revolt, but reinforce the behavior of individuals who occupy buildings and conduct, sometimes violent, demonstrations.

The report uses examples of the Whitmore Administration take-over, the Memorial Building take-over, the Admissions Building take-over, the take-over of the Daily Collegian offices and the attempted take-over, with a baseball bat on one of the Collegian's editors.

In each of these instances punitive measures were not taken, and, in two of the take-overs in particular, the students were encouraged and their demands met by the administration.

The demands were in regards to increased recruitment of minorities for the campus. By occupying Whitmore, students won 10 new minority slots for faculty.

In occupation of Memorial Hall, students won 40 new scholarships at the cost of $200,000, and an agreement that the University would aim for 20 percent minority freshmen enrollment by fall 1995.

The minority population at UMass is approximately 10 percent, and the state population is approximately 12 to 13 percent, according to MAS.

UMass is a state school, and by recruiting a number of minorities disproportionate to the number of minorities in the state, and recruiting from outside of the state, the administration takes spaces away from state residents who are White, according to MAS.

MAS recommends solutions to the conflicts at UMass, and other schools around the country that are running into the same type of problems.

The report suggests tightening up policies on admission, and looking more towards one's academic success and financial need before granting aid.

The administration should justify and describe long-term goals for minority representation, and should rid the dorms of segregation and edu-

Students encouraged to testify on GLB Rights Bill

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Almost exactly one year after Governor William Weld signed the Gay and Lesbian Student Rights Bill into law, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is sponsoring a statewide public hearing to address the way the law has affected the lives of gay, lesbian and bisexual youth.

The Gay and Lesbian Student Rights Bill was enacted to amend the General Laws to include protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. As a result of this amendment, gay, lesbian, and bisexual students have legal recourse to deal with discrimination in the public schools.

In today's hearing, held from 2:30 to 6:30 p.m. at the State House, GLB students grades K-12 are invited to testify on how the new legislation has or has not affected their lives.

Students still experience problems

According to the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth, although some students are clearly benefiting from the law — forming gay-straight alliances, inviting GLB speakers, and pressing schools to address homophobia — other students are still dealing with harassment and other problems on a daily basis.

Publicity surrounding the new law has yet to reach some communities, and in some cases, students have not received enough support to begin changing the situations at their individual schools.

The Governor's Commission is using today's hearing as a follow-up to determine what further action needs to be taken to assure the rights of GLB students.

Rights of GLB students protected

Under the new law, GLB students are entitled to the same "advantages, privileges and courses" as heterosexual students and have the right to protest discriminatory treatment by administration, students, faculty, and staff. For instance, students may issue grievances about teachers who make homophobic comments in class or about students who verbally or physically harass them.

Contacts for interested individuals

Individuals interested in gay, lesbian and bisexual student rights but unable to attend today's hearing are strongly encouraged to contact one of three state agencies directly involved in the enforcement and implementation of the law.

The Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination has been instrumental in the fight for GLB student rights and the rights of all Massachusetts residents. MCAD Chair Michael Duffy can be contacted at (617) 727-3990.

The Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth was created in early 1992 to assess the needs of GLB youth and come up with recommendations. Since then the Commission has been active in holding public hearings, distributing information on the law, and working to assure the rights of GLB youth. Commission Chair David LaFontaine can be reached at (617) 727-3600 x 312 (State House) or (617) 828-3039 (home).

The Massachusetts Department of Education has been working to improve curriculum and teacher training to improve the education environment for GLB students. The MDE General Counsel can be contacted at (617) 388-3300.

Russia invades Chechnya; seeks to re-establish control of rebellious Muslim nation

By Chris Bird
Associated Press

GROZNY, Russia — Russian troops and tanks entered the breakaway region of Chechnya early Sunday to restore Russian control, Russian officials said.

Three Russian tank columns, infantry and paratroopers were advancing on the capital of Grozny from different directions, according to Russian news reports.

There were no immediate reports of fighting.

A Russian government spokesman in Moscow, Alexei Margunov, said the military operation began at 5 a.m. and that there had been no resistance from Chechen forces.

Russian troops were 40 miles from Grozny after advancing for five hours, Margunov said.

There was no sign of fighting or air attacks in Grozny. The ITAR-Tass news agency initially reported that Chechen opposition forces backed by Moscow had launched an attack on Grozny, but later retracted the report.

Russian troops had been massed on the border of Chechnya and Chechen military commanders had declared themselves ready for war.

Chechen President Dzhokhar Dudayev said he was still willing to talk to find a peaceful settlement to the dispute.

"The Russian-Chechen conflict can be settled simply: the two sides need only to sit down at the negotiating table to achieve that," he told Tass late Saturday in Grozny.

Talks between Russian and Chechen officials had been scheduled for today. There was no word on whether the meeting would still go ahead.

Yeltsin ordered his government Friday to employ "all means at the state's disposal" to restore order and disarm "illegal armed groups."

Dudayev, a former Soviet air force general, declared Chechnya independent in 1991, but Moscow does not recognize the claim and has backed rebels against him.

Chechnya, a mostly Muslim nation of 1.2 million people, has a traditional warrior culture, notorious crime gangs and an abiding hatred of Russia.

The Chechens were conquered by Russia in the 19th century, and were later persecuted by dictator Josef Stalin, who accused them of collaboration with the Nazis and deported them en masse.

Russian leaders say Dudayev, who was elected in 1991 and declared one-man rule earlier this year, runs a criminal government that is destabilizing the Caucasus Mountain region, on Russia's southern flank.

Yeltsin sent in troops once before, in late 1991, after Chechnya declared its independence. The Russian forces retreated in the face of stiff opposition but Moscow has continued the fight by backing Chechen rebels.

No human being is illegal

AMHERST — Opponents of Proposition 187, California's controversial immigration law, listen to a speaker during a rally on the Amherst Common on Saturday. The rally, sponsored by a five college coalition of students and faculty, was part of a national effort to repudiate the new law which prevents illegal aliens from using public services except in emergencies. Speakers criticized the law for scapegoating socio-economic problems on immigrants and called for its immediate repeal. Approximately 70 people attended the two hour protest which concluded with participants singing Latin American songs.

Sciences awarded research grant

By Chris Hassett

University of Massachusetts graduate students in the sciences and engineering departments will reap the benefits of nearly $600,000 in funding for six research projects on waste reduction and environmental technology.

The funds were given by the Massachusetts Legislature to the National Environmental Technology for Waste Prevention Institute (NETI) which is still in its first year at UMass.

NETI is a research and technology transfer center that specializes in innovative process design solutions to minimize and prevent pollution, according to literature released by NETI.

NETI is being administered through The Environmental Institute here at UMass.

The research projects were selected from 19 proposals that were submitted by UMass faculty members. The remaining proposals were chosen by a panel of University engineers and scientists, and representatives assembled by the Massachusetts Chemical Technology Alliance.

Sharing in the grant is Michael Doherty, James Douglas and Michael Malone of chemical engineering; Scott Barton and Alan Lesser of polymer science and engineering; Salvatore Dinardi of the School of Public Health and Health Sciences; and David Reckhow of civil and environmental engineering.

"In the first year of operation we are keeping the administrative structure to a minimum by drawing on existing staff and putting prime emphasis on funding research projects in the academic departments which have promise of an early return on the investment," said Joseph Larson, director of The Environmental Institute.

The six proposals have been allotted almost $500,000 of the total grant, leaving $100,000 so far unused.

According to information released by NETI, the six funded proposals are:

• Development of measurement and modeling techniques called process visualization to better understand chemical production systems and to redesign chemical processes to reduce water and energy consumption and chemical and thermal emissions.

• Development of technologies to combine reaction and separation steps in chemical processing to reduce waste by-products and reduce the need for polluting solvents.

• Application of expert system technologies to identify the source of waste streams in chemical manufacturing processes and then identify alternative process designs to eliminate waste streams at various stages of the production process.

• Extraction of oily contaminants and hazardous organic additives from recyclable plastics using supercritical carbon dioxide extraction to increase the value and profitability of recycled plastics.

• Use of catalytic ozonation technology for low strength aqueous streams to treat compounds such as chlorinated dioxin in manufacturing processes.

• Use of real time air sampling with video recordings to evaluate the impact of employee work practices on exposures in the work place and provide feedback to modify worker behavior to reduce exposures.

Christmas is really neat

Nathan Crick

There was a guy ahead of me eating pizza as he walked down the sidewalk lined with trees bearing white Christmas lights. It was after midnight, and freezing cold out, and I was walking briskly towards my car after a night out. As I was closing in on him, he moved over to let me by.

"Oh wow," he laughed, his hand still gripping the pizza. "I thought it sounded like you were on a bike. That's why I moved, cause I didn't want you to run into me."

I told him with a hearty guffaw that I wasn't, and kept walking.

"You know," he kept talking behind me. "I bet you just pretended to sound like a bike to make me move out of the way," he was saying to himself.

I laughed again, quite robustly, as he ate his pizza.

For some ungodly reason, this bizarre little incident Thursday night made me kind of sad upon reflection. It kind of made me realize finally that this was my last Christmas at UMass and come next year I wouldn't be running into drunken UMass students in Amherst anymore. I'd be gone to the west coast somewhere, working for a living, and when the holidays come around I will buy cheap presents like neat Pez dispensers for all my friends because I won't have any money. I realized that when I am gone, I will miss that guy and his pizza. Hence I will miss everything.

Indeed, time has begun dropping away in big chunks now, as I slowly say goodbye to people as they disappear, and places as they grow old. Like the closing pages of a chapter after the bad guy has been shot, and Buddy and Margaret are reminiscing on the bus about all the friends who got body parts hacked off. It is supposed to be sad, but ends up being kind of funny. Our lives are stories, after all, and who can take these things seriously and still be happy?

"Poor Edgar," sighs Buddy. "He always wanted to be a fireman."

Margaret pats Buddy on the shoulder. "I know, but he'll always be with us inside, putting out the little fires in our hearts."

Hey, but they'll be fine. They've hooked up because of what happened to poor Edgar, after all.

Jimmy got a job as Santa Claus.

He dressed up in a fuzzy red suit with a pillow tied around his waist, and wore a beard that he suspected was made out of rabbit fur. It was warm and smooth. He felt kind of guilty about it, but kind of hoped it would bring him good luck.

"Good afternoon, shopper," he'd say as he stood in front of Ames. "Would you like to put some money in my bucket? It will make you feel good."

He got a lot of quarters. Sometimes old ladies would stop and talk to him about little plastic things they bought for their grandchildren. One of them walked out of the store and showed Jimmy a big super soaker water gun.

"Little Willy has been asking for this forever," she smiled. "Won't he just love it?"

Jimmy looked at it, his puffy white eyebrows knitting. "Don't kids shoot acid out of those things?" he asked.

"Umm...I don't know," she said, putting it in her bag and scurrying away, looking back over her shoulder fearfully.

Jimmy shrugged, and rubbed his rabbit fur beard.

"Ho ho ho!" he shouted. "It's Christmas, please give money! It is a nice thing to do!"

The manager of the store came outside, smoking a cigarette. "Hey Jim, how are you doing out here?" he asked, puffing.

"Oh, good," he nodded, looking out in the parking lot. "Did you give anything today?" he asked.

"Oh, yeah," said the manager. "I gave some to the other Santa."

"Oh, that one," said Jimmy. He thought the manager was a funny guy, always kidding. "Are you scared to die?" he asked, ringing his bell. A young couple walked by, ignoring him. "Ho ho ho!" he yelled at them.

"What?" asked the manager.

"I said are you scared to die?" he smiled, although it made his face itch. He scratched it will the bell, making it ring.

"Um, no I don't think so," he said, glancing around nervously. "Why do you ask?"

"Oh no reason," Jimmy said. "Just figured since that you will die eventually you might have given it some thought."

"Um...not really," said the manager, stepping on his cigarette. "Have a good day Jimmy."

"Thank you," he said, and the manager walked inside. "Hey, it's Christmas! Give me money!" he shouted again, ringing his bell. A few children started laughing at him.

"Ho ho ho!" he yelled at them, and they ran away.

"I forgot how beautiful a snowfall looked like," said Eustacia Fields, sipping her hot chocolate and looking out her apartment window. The grass still peered up through the blanket of snow, being slowly buried in a veil of white.

"Don't get all sappy on me again, now," laughed Kent from the kitchen as he stirred soup. "I've had it up to here with your stories," he said.

"And where exactly is 'here'?" she asked.

"Um . . . somewhere around the armpit level," he called. "Or about the middle of the sternum."

"Oh."

Kent walked around the corner and stood beside Eustacia. "But I digress," he smiled. "Please, tell me all about it, Italian Christmas."

"Oh, shut up."

"No, no, please," he laughed. "I want to know how the Pope personally gave you a chocolate covered cross for Christmas. I love that story."

"That was uncalled for, senator," she said. "And it doesn't matter anyway. All that's the past, and I'm sick of talking about the past."

"Yep. Wherever you go, there you are, I say," said Kent, nodding.

"Yeah, good one Kent," she smiled. "You really know how to put it all in perspective."

"Well, I just work here, ma'am."

"We all just work here, Kent. That's the great part about people. Nobody has a clue," she paused. "Let's eat some soup."

Modern prophets on bathroom walls

Tara Ruelle

I hurriedly ran down the hall in Herter the other night desperately seeking a bathroom after sucking down a large Coke, a.k.a. a "bladder buster." I reached my destination with no time to spare, not even enough time to line the seat with my token toilet paper safety wrap. I immediately assumed the "this is a public bathroom" squat position. Since i was alone with no background chatter to amuse me I decided to quickly scan the walls surrounding me for some light reading. What I found though was anything but light and amusing.

It all came back to me at that moment though as I reflected on my previous Herter bathroom experiences. My first semester here at UMass was encompassed with many bathroom excursions in the great Herter hall, particularly since i took a College Writing class there and had to make that brisk walk from Northeast. I remembered doing the same bathroom squat alone and reading words that spouted hate and profanity. It just struck me funny then, now it makes me wonder.

Several things immediately come to mind as I wonder about these bathroom scrawls. Firstly, who would spend the time to write all of these poignant messages like, "If you collect cans does that make you a bum?" and responses such as, "no of course not, who are you to judge you bch?" Secondly, apparent from their penmanship, who would sit down on the urine sprayed seat just to write these important passages? Thirdly, who has a pen handy when they run in to do their duty? Lastly and certainly not least, is this why there's always a line down the hall when one has to relieve themselves, because someone needs to write serious diary messages on the can?

I personally have one thought only when entering the restroom, to do what I came there to do. No other intense thoughts race through my mind. If my only audience is in a stall with a door and a toilet I think I would reassess my motives for writing. There seems to be plenty of other outlets available to these aspiring journalists. Intensely personal messages should probably not be wasted on the local public bathroom walls. I of course am guilty of contributing to these authors habits by reading their ramblings, but I still don't understand their purposes.

What I do find amusing is that there are noticeable differences as you get older between elementary school bathroom writing and college notes. When I was a budding public bathroom user I read mainly profanity in the short stalls of my elementary school. In college being a pro at the art of the very feminine squat, I have read more in depth profanity accompanying philosophical ramblings. I guess what is most striking to me is that the words get bigger, but the messages remain the same. Generally, there is no point to these paragraphs and at least when you were a kid reading the word (insert expletive,) was somewhat amusing. Now reading those words is more on the annoying side and only slightly humorous.

I guess now I should try to make a point out of my commentary on the scribblings of public bathroom users. I suppose I should say that I would undoubtedly be more impressed if the messages were more humorous and less political. I would also be more impressed if i read some of these quotes in a newspaper, magazine or journal rather than on the walls next to a toilet. Most importantly, why make people hold their breath in anticipation while you create your written masterpiece. I think people should definitely express themselves without having to express themselves to do so.

To the editor:

The Collegian article printed of Dec. 9 about the SGA's position on tuition and fees contained many factual errors and misquotes. On Dec. 7 the SGA Senate voted to recommend a 7.5 percent increase in the Student Activities fee for the next academic year. This fee would amount to an additional $3.15 per student per semester.

What is this fee for? The Student Activities fee completely funds Registered Student Organizations such as the Theater Guild and the Ahora. it funds all the campus Agencies such as Legal Services, Off Campus Housing and WMUA. It also helps to fund PVTA bus service; the annual Spring Concert as well as well as the Area Governments.

The Student Activities fee (SATF) is placed in a trust fund which is then allocated to student groups by the Student Government and is the only fund which distributes budgets through a democratic process every spring. This is the only fund that students have complete control over.

Why do we need the increase? Unlike all the other fees on this campus, there hasn't been an increase in the Student Activities fee in 12 years. This has caused serious erosion of the fund. Required deficit spending and worse still cut deeply into the budgets of all student organizations — the life blood of our campus.

According to the Ways and Means Committee of the SGA, the current Student Activities fee amount is not sufficient to maintain even the present operating levels of student groups. Without the increase, deeper cuts will be necessary, which could jeopardize the existence of some organizations.

But here is what is most important: This academic year some fees were raised while others were lowered. The end result was a 0 percent increase overall in both tuition and fees and a $53.07 refund for every student on this campus. A 0 percent increase is our goal for next year as well. This campaign is already underway.

Reader offended by cartoons

To the editor:

I have been reading the Collegian for my entire UMass career. After almost 3 years I had to draw the line. There have been a lot of controversial issues hated and debated in these hallowed pages, but I think I have found perhaps the most heinous abuse of the impressionable student body. I am speaking of the inane, supposedly funny Collegian ads.

Recently you have gone over the edge. The straw that broke the camel's back was in the Friday, Dec. 2 issue. The ad in question is headed by that frequently appearing, disturbing White male, smiling with a pipe in his mouth. Firstly, just what is in that pipe? Is it some sort of drug? Is this a funny image? Is this the kind of image we want to present to all our fine, healthy, smoke-free students?

Second, when reading the text a second and then a third time I found nothing coherent in this senseless dribbie. There are three separate mentions of cruelty to animals. A dog gets brutally shot, kittens are drowned, and a horse is appallingly juggled and then dropped? I am sorry but again where is the humor? Maybe the creators of these atrocities find something entertaining here, but I don't and I imagine many people know why.

If the writers of this nonsense truly wanted to get a laugh, they went about it in the wrong way. They got mixed up. First it is kittens and/or cats that are juggled. Second, as anyone knows, it is horses that are shot and not dogs. Finally it seems most appropriate that an unwanted dog would be bound in a sack and drowned in a treacherous river. I hope that this bit of feedback can help your team of writers and spare us from more confusion and trickery.

To the editor:

It was very nice for Chancellor David K. Scott to have a policy on free speech drafted in time for Dr. Anthony Martin's visit. However, there is already a policy on free expression in effect. It is called the First Amendment.

Freedom of speech in complemented by the freedom of assembly, assuring us the right to hear what is said. But we are also responsible for the consequences of what we say and do.

Jewish students respond to speech

To the editor:

I do not understand what happened Tuesday night. I am a Jewish student who attended the speech by Tony Martin. I went in having no expectations. I left feeling sick, disgusted, threatened and full of confusion inside. I left feeling emotions I never before felt. I left crying. The tension in the room between the Black students and the Jewish students was extreme.

I very much understand the need for Black leadership and empowerment, and feel it's necessity for minority groups to have representation. What I do not understand is why the Jewish people are so often mentioned and exploited in the quest for Black leadership. Why is there so much anti- Semitism in Tony Martin's speaking? Why does he feel that in order for the Black population to gain power they need to put down another minority group?

After Mr. Martin's speech there was a question and answer session. The Jewish students in line were not given the opportunity to speak as they were booed away by Black students. A question was asked that if Mr. Martin is focusing on Black Empowerment, why is he so involved in denying that six million Jews died in the Holocaust? To this a group of Black girls to my right said "yeah, and they missed the rest of you."

This should not be happening. I was never taught to hate like this, nor have I experienced hate like this. I also do not want to believe that Mr. Martin was speaking for every Black person. I am so enraged right now and I am not quite sure what to do with my feelings and emotions. I do know that there needs to be some kind of civilized dialogue between Jewish students and Black students on campus. This cannot continue.

Lynne Wolfson
Hillel Treasurer

To the editor:

As a Jewish male, I was embarrassed by some of the behavior displayed by some members of the Jewish community on Tuesday night. While Dr. Martin is clearly anti–Semitic, there is absolutely no reason to attack him back. It will only make Black–Jewish relations worse.

I was also appalled by the way the question–and–answer session went. When someone tried to disagree with Dr. Martin, their opinion was quickly thrown out and they were told to be quiet and return to their seat. The one good opinion that was able to be displayed was that of an audience member in reference to the Anti–Defamation League. He said that he would condemn any liar; Black, White, Jew or Gentile. His comment went completely unanswered by Dr. Martin, who just continued with what he was saying, rather than try to argue with the most intelligent statement made all night. Of course, this wasn't said during the question–and–answer session, or else it probably would have been buried under a subduing effort by the member of The Fruits of Islam who was in charge of the session.

Josh Shear
Orchard Hill

To the editor:

As two Jewish students who have invested time, energy, and money in this University, it enrages us that our peers who continue to blatantly offend us by bringing yet another anti–Semitic speaker to campus. We attended Tony Martin's lecture on Tuesday night, and left feeling hurt, disturbed, and shaken. Never in our lives have we found ourselves in such a forum, a forum of hatred, anger, and lies.

Mr. Martin's diatribe of distortions were infinite. He groundlessly blames the Jews for everything from the slave trade to the condition of Black people in America today. Martin's Jewish conspiracy theories have gone as far as to accuse Hillel of being a part of an organized Jewish plot against Black students on this campus.

Once again the University community has condoned the message of an anti–Semite and fostered an atmosphere of bigotry and intimidation. Martin's lecture reflected a lynch mob mentality as supporters cheered and applauded the kind of anti–Semitic remarks which Jews have endured for centuries. After hearing James Callahan III, Martin's introductory speaker, it appears that it is today's Jew that is still swinging from a tree.

Nurit Ben–Harav Lore Rappaport
Hillel President Hillel Secretary

To the editor:

Whether or not one vies Professor Antony Martin's speech and work as anti–Semitic, there is no person who could convince me that his analysis would lead to action which would help end racism at any level. in fact Martin's speech simplified our culture to the point where solutions seem to be easy, which they never are. He stated that Jews played a major part in subverting African American leaders and African Americans throughout U.S. history. This view leads to a major oversimplification of racism in the United States. It also implies that taking the Jewish influence out of this equation would drastically reduce racism in our country. We need analysis which emphasized the collective responsibility of all those who have created and sustained this racism culture.

The Nutcracker creates lasting X-Mas dreams

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The smell of gingerbread wafts through the house. The lights on the tree sparkle and reflect off the brightly colored ornaments. It's Christmas — a time rich in tradition and what better way to celebrate the season than by going to see a performance of The Nutcracker?

Ballet companies nationwide will be putting on performances of this celebrated ballet throughout the holiday season. Perhaps the most renown is the Boston Ballet Company. Twenty–four pairs of pointed shoes are worn out during each of the shows performance and more than 320 children from around New England will participate in this year's Wang Center performances running from Nov. 25, 1994 – Jan. 1, 1995.

The ballet was first choreographed in 1892 by Marius Petipa and Lev Ivanhoe. Ivanhoe was also responsible for elevating Russian ballet up to its current world status by creating masterpieces like Swan Lake and The Sleeping Beauty. It celebrated its 102nd Anniversary this year and premiered on Dec. 18, 1892 in St. Petersburg, Russia.

Who can forget the aura of magic that surrounds the opening scene when Clara is first presented with the nutcracker from her mysterious looking uncle. Maybe it's the dancing life sized dolls that catch you, or perhaps it's the Christmas tree that grows to a height of 45 ft. before your disbelieving eyes.

For some it's the Land of Sweets where dancers represent tea and chocolate or the graceful dance of the Sugarplum fairy and her entourage. Maybe it's the beautiful duet of the Snow Queen and King that brings tears to your eyes and a swelling in your heart.

Or perhaps it's the mere beauty of Tchaikovsky's composition that brings the ballet together, melding the perfection of classic ballet with the orchestra's sweet strains of melodious harmony.

Yet it is the main story of Clara and the valiant nutcracker price fighting off the evil rat king that reminds us about the true spirit of Christmas and the triumph of good over evil for love.

Be sure to check out a performance and experience the magic of The Nutcracker for yourself.

The Nutcracker Ballet will be performed at the Wang Center until Jan. 1, 1995. It's located at 270 Tremont Street, Boston. Tickets can be ordered by calling Ticketmaster at (617) 931–ARTS.

Pioneer Valley residents can also view The Nutcracker at the Academy of Music in Northampton beginning Dec. 16. by the Pioneer Valley Ballet Company. Tickets can be purchased at the Norithampton Box Office in Thorne's Market.

Indigo Girls closer to fine at Mullins Ctr. show

Folk–pop duo Ray & Saliers ignite energetic performance

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

INDIGO GIRLS
Mullins Center
Dec. 9

The Indigo Girls performed many of their hits Friday night at the Mullins Center.

Streams of light cascaded along the stage, enveloping the performers. The Indigo Girls, entangled in this web of light, managed to surge out, illuminating the stage with an impressive ensemble of harmonious vocals.

Those vocals rang through the corridors of the Mullins Center Friday night and managed to stir up the jam–packed arena, while snow and sleet accumulated on their cars outside.

The Girls came onto stage dressed in ordinary, everyday clothes — probably the same they wear to go grocery shopping — and managed to dazzle the crowd with their music, warmth and energy.

They kicked the evening off by joining the opening act, K's Choice, in covering Neil Young's "Rockin' in the Free World," and came back out shortly after to start their own set off with tunes from their new album Swamp Ophelia.

As soon as the lights went down, a troop of die–hard fans migrated to the front of the stage, and stayed there for the duration.

The audience sang all the words in harmony, during songs like "Least Complicated," "Closer to Fine," "Kid Fears" and the "Power of Two."

The pinnacle of the show was reached during the song "This Train." Amy Ray whipped the crowd up with this heart–felt commemoration to those who suffered through the Holocaust.

Emily Saliers sang some of her less turbulent works, such as "Let It Be Me," "Joking," and "Language or the Kiss."

They played all of the songs off the new album, except for one, and a handful of songs from the other four earlier releases, resulting in a good balance of the old and the new.

Regardless of the tempo, the Indigo girls managed to keep the energy level high, keep it personal and add a little Georgian hospitality, with a big "Thank you" [illegible] Girls, for all of those who had the [illegible] the snowy conditions.

The encore consisted of tunes from [illegible] Girls, for all of those who had the [illegible] the snowy conditions.

Two new short story collections are just in time for Christmas

By Prudence Heller
Associated Press

Christmas is not all sweetness and light in Richard Dalby's Mystery for Christmas (St. Martin's, $20.95). There are ghosts, spirits, a banshee, magicians and a gypsy to be found in this collection of holiday stories.

The authors, mostly British, range from Charles Dickens to Muriel Spark and John Whitbourn. The characters range from Sherlock Holmes and Watson (reincarnated by Ron Weighell) to Mrs. Craggs, a retired cleaning woman with amazing powers of observation.

Mrs. Craggs helps solve "The Case of the Seven Santas" by H.R.F. Keating, known to mystery lovers as the creator of Bombay's Inspector Ghote. The scene here, though, is the English countryside.

The murder victim is an old squire who was inspired by Dickens' A Christmas Carol and who decked his halls with boughs of holly every Christmas.

In Spark's brief, amusing story, "The Leaf–Sweeper," a man is introduced to his ghost. A seance in an English country drawing room with a cast of characters worthy of Agatha Christie is greeted first with scorn, then terror.

Holmes and Watson help a university researcher solve "The Case of the Fiery Messengers." All agree they won't talk to others about the 16th–century scholar whose image — a ghost? something else? — appeared at the climactic point in the case.

In another story, Marjorie Bowen, under the pseudonym Joseph Shearing, gives us a woman who finally manages to leave the somber London atmosphere where she grew up for marriage, sunny Italy and music.

She reluctantly returns to her old home to help an orphaned niece and gets taken in by an imposter who leaves her a Christmas present of sorts - "The Chinese Apple."

American author Edward Lucas White, meanwhile, tantalizes the reader with "The Picture Puzzle." The story has the happy ending many people probably associate with the holiday season.

On the other hand, "Ellison's Christmas Dinner" by Dolf Wyllarde is guaranteed to leave a bad taste in the mouth.

This latest collection by Dalby is a varied assortment - different people will have different favorites - and readers will have to let their imaginations run loose to enjoy it.

Arnold delivers, but Emma can't save crybaby script

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

JUNIOR
Directed by Ivan Reitman with Arnold Schwarzenegger
Emma Thompson & Danny DeVito

Junior is a movie based on an interesting thought: what if men could bear children? However, it's also one of those thoughts that weren't meant to test the realms of reality.

Directed by Ivan Reitman, the man who gave us Dave and Ghostbusters, one would think that the movie would be funny and it is, but only mildly so. The plot revolves a stoic geneticalogist played by Arnold Schwartzenegger and a fast– talking obstetrician (Danny DeVito) who reluctantly team up to save an experiment on a revoiutionary drug that helps women who have a history of miscarriages carry their babies to term.

The experiment is shut down and Arnold has to carry a baby because it's illegal to test a non–approved FDA drug on humans. So Arnold is impregnated by an egg taken from an experiment taken from the scientist who takes over his lab (Emma Thompson).

Of course we see the jokes about Arnold getting morning sickness, gaining weight, eating like a horse. All these things are amusing, but expected because we all know that (ha ha) men don't know the first thing about having a baby. Then there is the dilemma of hiding his growing stomach from the world and the sneaky college dean that booted Arnold and from the lab (Frank Langella).

The plot is partially saved by Thompson, who plays the stereotypical absent–minded professor (only this time it's a woman) and Arnold's love interest. She plays her character to the hilt (as always) tripping over her own shoes to knocking a waiter's tray over when waving at a party.

DeVito is just okay as the business–minded doctor who at first cares nothing about the baby Arnold is carrying, but then grows to love and care for it.

Junior is mildly amusing and at brief times even funny, but the plot drags and it seems as if the writer is trying to cram every funny thing he can think of into the script - "i know! Let's have Arnold shop for baby's clothes dressed like Mrs. Doubtfire!" After a while it just melds into one long yawn and you can't wait for the baby to be delivered, the college dean to be thwarted and Arnold and Emma going off to do whatever. C

Sequel lives up to its billing

By Andrew Bryce

BALTIMORE — In order to appreciate the battle between centers Joe Smith and Marcus Camby on Saturday, prior knowledge of their first matchup must be acquired.

It would be like watching Rocky II without seeing the first Rocky. The second can be enjoyably dramatic and exciting, but not knowing the idiosyncrasies of the Rocky Balboa-Apollo Creed war from the first erases the ultimate purpose and true meaning of the result.

It is easy to read that Maryland's Smith led all scorers with 30 points, and that Camby swatted five shots while scoring 15 points and pulling down 11 boards. And it is just as simple as glancing at the scoresheet to see that Massachusetts came away with an 85–74 victory over the Terrapins at the Baltimore Arena.

If the game was watched, the intensity between the two was continous throughout the entire game. The low-post action between Smith–Camby was relentless, and both buried jumpers from outside. A duel in a game of personal duels, and the most heated one. Why? Because of Mar. 19's version of Smith-Camby.

Witcita, Kan., was the sight of the opening chapter, and moving on in the NCAA Tournament was on the line. It was Maryland who advanced to the Midwest Regional semifinals by defeating the Minutemen, 95–87. As for Smith–Camby, take your choice. Smith scored 22 points to lead six Terrapin scorers in double-digits, and Camby shined in his last game of the season, scoring a career–high 32 points and grabbing 10 rebounds.

This year was the same, but different.

In Saturday's extremely exciting game amidst such big– game ingredients as a raucous' sea–of–red Maryland crowd, an ABC–viewing audience and a seated row of NBA scouts, it was Massachusetts who outlasted Maryland this time.

And this time, it was Camby who was one of five double–scorers, while Smith knocked home the game–high total. Notice a trend? The edge in scoring totals and the loss as a result typify what the rivalry produces.

The exchanges between the two were interesting throughout the 40 minutes of action.

With over 11 minutes to play in the first half, Camby went coast–to–coast for a missed lay–up, and was fouled. After his two made free throws, Smith came back at 10:38 with a hook shot in the paint. On the very next Massachusetts possession, Camby hit a 17–foot jumper at 10:25 to increase their lead to eight, 22–14.

Then there was the end of the first half when Smith and his fellow Terrapins attempted to rally to cut a Minutemen lead that reached as high as 10. Smith blew right by Camby for a lay–in to cut it to three, 35–32, and a 15–foot fadeaway jumper over Massachusetts' 6–foot 11–inch center with 3:42 left in the half did the same to make it 37–34.

The second half was like the first half, as if two boxers were exchanging blows in the second half of a fight. A short Camby jumper at the start of half was followed by a Smith lay–in shortly after.

The 6–foot 9–inch center began to put Terrapin Coach Gary Williams plan into effect, taking it to Camby, bodying up on him. The Minutemen center was whistled three times in a matter of 1:18, with two coming at the aggressiveness of Smith and his low–post scoring moves.

How 'bout these two centers from long range? Smith drained a three–pointer with 11:48 left, Camby buried a baseline jumper about five feet closer with 3:49 remaining.

While Smith is making the college basketball world and prospective NBA takers drool with his offensive ability, Camby is doing the same on the other side of the ball.

"Camby is one of those guys that blocks shots when you don't think he has a chance to be a part of the play," said Terrapin Coach Gary Williams. "He came from a long way a couple of times, and that means, to me, he's a great shot blocker who can play (his) man very tough and can still make the play on the drive down on the other side of the lane.

"He takes that one step across the lane, and gets off the floor very well. He plays like he's about 6–foot 6, only he's 6–foot 11."

It is safe to say that Smith and Camby have a rivalry despite only playing against each other three times. It is safe to say that Smith and Camby would be lottery picks if they chose to enter next year's NBA draft.

And it is safe to say that Saturday's Joe Smith–Marcus Camby sequel lived up to its high expectations.

Mike Williams – 18 points, 3 three-pointers, 3 assists

Highlights...

With Lou Roe, Marcus Camby, and Derek Kellogg in foul trouble, the rest of the squad stepped up.

Led by 18 points by Mike Williams, the Minutemen were able to hold off second half rallies by Maryland to earn an 85–74 win.

Edgar Padilla scored 12 points including 3 treys. Dana Dingle had eleven including seven consecutive points down the stretch.

Donta Bright in his return to his native Baltimore outscored cousin Keith Booth 12–6.

The Minutemen improved their record to 3–1.

Williams' presence spurs UMass win

With teammates in foul trouble, senior guard steps it up

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

BALTIMORE — It was not Mike Williams' shooting, his passing or his defense that led No. 5 Massachusetts past No. 11 Maryland, 85–74, Saturday afternoon. It was his presence.

With senior co–captains Lou Roe and Derek Kellogg confined to the bench after fouling out, Williams, who was disciplined and benched for three games earlier in the season by Massachusetts Coach John Calipari, seized the moment and became the leader of the Minutemen in the second half.

"Mike Williams — you talk about his game in the last two games. Forget about shooting, forget about moves to the basket, the quickness, the great defense ... he's making every player on our team better," Calipari said.

The senior from Hartford, Conn. poured in a team–high 18 points, including 12 in the second half. Williams said he knew that without Roe, he needed to step it up for his team.

"[After fouling out], Lou came to me and said, 'Mike, you're a senior, you can do it, you know you can — you've got to take over. There's nobody else out there who is going to take the shot,'" Williams said. "Either I had to take the shot or get somebody else the shot."

Williams' willingness to shoot the open jumper from anywhere on the court has been both an asset and a detriment to the Massachusetts' offense. His effectiveness from behind the three–point arc in Saturday's contest was especially impressive seeing that Maryland used junior forward Exree Hipp––one of the most athletically gifted players in the nation––on Williams just as it did in Maryland's 95–87 victory over the Minutemen in last year's NCAA Tournament.

In that prior meeting, Williams shot a woeful 1–for–4 from three–point range, and while he only stroked 3–for–9 on Saturday, all three treys were important shots.

"I told Coach that they had to get me open because Exree Hipp is 6–foot–7–inches and I couldn't get an open shot by just dribbling," Williams said. "I knew if I could get some open shots, I could make them. That's what happened, and fortunately they went down."

Williams fired away from the moment he stepped on the court — only two minutes after Williams checked in at the 17:10 mark of the first half, he nailed a trey from the left corner, his first shot of the game to knot the game at seven.

Later in the half, with Massachusetts leading 29–26, Williams sliced through three Maryland defenders, put the ball behind his back, laid it up and in, and drew the foul on guard Matt Kovarik, dazzling the crowd in the Baltimore Arena in the process.

"I'm not an outside shooter," Williams laughed. "Yet if you're going to be out there and you're nervous, you shouldn't be out there. The game is 40 minutes and you go out there and play. If I have open shots, I'm going to take them. If I don't, I'm going to try and get other people open shots."

After Maryland's Joe Smith scored under the basket to cut the lead to 53–50 with 14:11 left in the second half, Williams checked back into the game and scored eight consecutive points, including two three–pointers on back–to– back offensive trips.

With Kellogg on the bench, Williams played in the backcourt with sophomore Edgar Padilla, who is still somewhat inexperienced in only his second year at Massachusetts.

Williams went through a similar learning process to that of Padilla's with Calipari and the Minutemen, moving from the point guard spot as a freshman to the shooting guard spot because he often played out of control. Now the senior is on the other end of the spectrum.

"Being a senior, I have to tell him how to play in certain situations, and he listens. It's a learning process for a guard," Williams said. "Everybody, when they're young, they make mistakes. That's the learning process and you have to go through it."

Massachusetts and Maryland have played three times in the last 12 months, and in each of the games Williams' played well in, the Minutemen were victorious. He tallied 25 points, 10 assists and seven rebounds last December against the Terrapins.

When asked of the rivalry developing between Massachusetts and Maryland, Williams said the array of talented players and coaches makes it great.

"It's a great competition between each player. Joe Smith– Marcus Camby. You got Exree Hipp, you got Donta.. you got Johnny Rhodes," Williams said. "You got Lou Roe. Some great players, some All–Americans out of high school. Two great coaches, and great fans. Without that, there wouldn't be college basketball."

And without Mike Williams, Massachusetts may not have defeated Maryland.

few teams can handle, including Maryland. What's important to the Minutemen is they have a quick and explosive offense, but it's more controlled and less helter– skelter than last year. Proof can be found in the improvement of outside shooting, especially in their shot– selection.

Calipari is happy his more–composed team held on.

"I was really amazed that we were able to hold on with the foul trouble we had," Calipari said. "That's a character– builder because its amazing that they made that run and went up, and we didn't just cave in."

"I like their depth, bringing people off their bench like they do," Coach Williams said. "They have good players, they have size to bring in. There's some good depth over there."

"You can't take that deep breath and say we made it back, we got the lead, instead of clawing and grabbing like we were."

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari breathed a sigh of relief following the game.

"I was really amazed that we were able to hold on the way we did, with the foul trouble we had," Calipari said. "It was a real character builder. It was amazing that we didn't just cave in."

With the foul trouble to three of its stars, Massachusetts needed some of its other players to step up. Dingle, Edgar Padilla and freshman Inus Norville all answered the call.

Dingle chipped in 11 points (seven crucial in the second half) and six rebounds. Padilla was also effective scoring 12 points going 3–for–3 from three point land.

Norville, in only his third collegiate game, was on the floor during crunch time. He scored six points, but more importantly was excellent on defense with two key blocks down the stretch.

Calipari was impressed with his freshman's output.

"How about Inus Norville?" Calipari said. "He was blocking shots...dunking balls...reverse lay–ups...he made every free throw..."

"I like their depth. They have good players they can bring in," Williams said. "There is some good depth over there. Padilla did a great job today. He came out and really played."

The much anticipated home–coming of Donta Bright featured 12 points and three key offensive boards for the former Dunbar high–school star. His cousin and former teammate, Terp forward Keith Booth, had trouble scoring (six points) but grabbed 12 boards and was effective in guarding Roe.

After coming as close as they did, Gary Williams was disappointed that the Terrapins could not hold on after the game.

"This was a great game, to be able to play this in December with great crowd," Williams said. "Everything was great for us, and then we don't get it. That really hurts. You can't be accepting doing some good things in place of a win."

The Minutemen return to action this Wednesday night, when they take on Princeton at the William D. Mullins center.

Is Your Smoke Detector Working?

More Americans have smoke detectors than ever before. But nearly half don't work.

Without a working smoke detector as an early warning device, fire can spread unnoticed through the household, blocking escape routes and filling rooms with deadly smoke.

Make sure you're protected. Start a lifesaving habit this October 30. When you change your clock from daylight-saving time, change the batteries in your smoke detectors.

The Far Side By Gary Larson

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Rechecking all information and elbowing time for delays will prevent costly snags. You are able to handle a heavy work schedule without sacrificing a high–quality performance.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): You may upset someone unintentionally today. Show your tender side. A master disagreement could hamper progress. Talk over any personal concerns with your loved ones. A conciliatory attitude will mend any broken fences.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Good news and an upbeat mood make this a wonderful workday. A gung–ho business attitude yields to more romantic impulses this evening. Take the time to look after your health department. Don't overtax an opportunity that is right under your nose. Romance continues to sizzle.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Be willing to make a few personal sacrifices for the good of the entire group. Try not to get discouraged if your love life seems slow. It will pick up soon. Be more objective.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Minor obstacles may crop up with co–workers or clients. Exercise your authority, tactfully and cooperation will be easier to come by. A phone call proves uplifting. Stop dragging your heels on a creative project.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Your ideas and words find a warm welcome today. A confident attitude makes a favorable impression. Think big — there will be time to refine your plans later on. Complete old business promptly.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Take steps to make long–overdue changes, instead of relying on others. Award scattering your energies. Pick out some holiday presents during the lunch hour. Forget about joke gifts when shopping for practical types.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Try using your inside connections to speed progress. Taking an imaginative, down–two approach to your goals impresses those around you. Avoid shooting from the hip. Freudian slips may give clues to your real feelings.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Former co–workers, friends and professional advisers may be urging you toward installation of a goal. Welcome their input and support. Sifting deep–seated feelings will backfire. Discuss any worries with someone you trust.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Collaborative enterprises enjoy highly favorable influences. Stress similarities in goals, rather than differences in methods. You must manage your business interests with both determination and sensitivity. A romantic interlude could prove frustrating. Be patient.

Mike Williams steps up

With teammates in foul trouble Mike Williams stepped up and led the Minutemen in the stretch run in their 85-74 win over Maryland (See story page 6).

In the third meeting between sophomores Marcus Camby and Joe Smith, Smith may have won on the scoring battle, but Camby was key to UMass's win. See story page 6.

UMass to host Providence in home opener

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team is hosting the Lady Friars of Providence tonight at 7 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center.

Providence comes in with an overall record of 3-3, 1-0 in the tough Big East conference. They are coming off an impressive victory over the Georgetown Lady Hoyas on Saturday, 82-63.

The Lady Friars are led by Jen Davis, Nadine Malcolm, Sarah Miller, Heidi Moyano and Ayanna Walden. Freshman Kerri Chatten has also performed well for Providence.

The Minutewomen are coming off a heartbreaking loss to the Detroit Lady Titans on Saturday, 66-65 (see related story) and have struggled to start of the season, losing their first five games for a record of 0-5.

Minutemen surge past Maryland

■ Five players score in double figures as UMass avenges last year's lost to Terrapins

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

BALTIMORE — Redemption.

On the strength of its best team effort of the season the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team avenged last year's NCAA tournament loss to Maryland, beating the Terrapins 85-74 at sold-out Baltimore Arena in front of a hostile pro-Terrapin crowd Saturday.

Massachusetts	85
Maryland	74

The game was billed as one of the this year's top matchups going in, and it certainly lived up to its billing, especially in an up-and-down second half.

Going into the game Maryland Coach Gary Williams' game plan was to get Lou Roe and Marcus Camby into foul trouble. That plan was effective as Roe picked up his fourth foul early in the second half relegating him to the bench, with UMass up by six.

"We thought we could go inside and get Camby and Roe in foul trouble," said Maryland Coach Gary Williams. "We were able to do that."

With Roe out, the Terrapins seemed to gain momentum, but as he has done so many times before, Mike Williams stepped up and scored UMass' next eight points (including two three-pointers) to increase the lead by a point.

When Camby picked up his fourth foul, Maryland attacked again cutting the lead to four, but the Minutemen answered with instant offense from an unlikely source. Dana Dingle, who is usually known for defense and rebounding, scored seven unanswered points to give Massachusetts its biggest lead of the half.

Foul trouble continued for Massachusetts, as Roe fouled out with 7:08 remaining. He finished with a meager six points and four rebounds in only 19 minutes.

Maryland took advantage of Roe's absence and once again chipped away at UMass lead, led by All-America candidate Joe Smith. The 6 foot-10 center led the way for the Terrapins throughout, scoring 30 points and grabbing seven rebounds. He scored eight during Maryland's 10-2 run, and with 4:36 remaining his second free throw run gave the Terps their first lead since 15:17 in the first half.

The Minutemen did not fold however, and regained the lead to stay when Camby buried a baseline jumper to put UMass ahead to stay.

Maryland tried to make another comeback, but fell short as UMass, despite Kellogg and Camby fouling out, held on to win.

Gary Williams was impressed with UMass' performance at the end.

"We made a good run down here on our court and took the lead and they were tough enough to come back. Good teams have that capability. They did a great job in that situation where a lot of teams would fold," Williams said.

Strong bench play makes UM victory a team effort

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

BALTIMORE — Maryland coach Gary Williams had the fitting game plan against the strong, aggressive No. 5 Massachusetts squad. Take it to the hole, put a body on and draw the fouls from big guys named Lou Roe and Marcus Camby. Get them into foul trouble.

The No. 11 Terrapins were capable of doing so, as Roe and Camby did foul out. The problem for Maryland arose when the Minutemen were not led by a player that has the last name Roe, but by a host of others who stepped in to compensate for the detrimental absences.

The 85-74 Massachusetts victory involved the quintessential team effort — five players scoring in double- figures, eight Minutemen seeing more than ten minutes of playing time. It all had to do with the fact that they racked up 28 personal fouls as a team during the game, fouling the two standouts out of the game and having three others in danger throughout the second half.

Enter Massachusetts coach John Calipari, who had to do a little bit of coaching himself. Against an explosive front six that Maryland poses, Calipari had to utilize his deep bench with a proper substitution system.

With Roe (6 points) picking up his third foul with 17:42 left and Camby picking up three fouls in span of 1:18 in the second half, the shuffling of the players was crucial. Many times through the first 12-plus minutes, Roe would go in for Camby, and likewise.

If it was not Camby and Roe being rotated, Inus Norville (who ended up with four fouls himself) was thrown in the mix. Calipari could not have asked for much more from the freshman, who scored six points and pulled down four rebounds in just his third career regular-season game. That included a reverse layup off a fast-break that put the Minutemen up by three in the first half, 39-36.

"How about Inus? Where did he come from? This guy, blocking shots, dunking balls, reverse layups, made every free throw. Make him pee in the bottle after this one," Calipari said.

Dana Dingle and Donta Bright were no slouches, either. Dingle (11 points) rattled off seven consecutive points with less than ten minutes left in the game, including a monster dunk that turned out to be a three-point play with 8:12 left.

"Seven points in a row after the timeout. Big rebound offensively, stick back. Big dunk on somebody, the foul. All of a sudden, Dana Dingle changes the whole complexion of the game," Calipari said.

Bright came out strong in the second half, finishing with 12 points. Bright, who grew up in Baltimore, went up against the likes of his first cousin, Terrapin Keith Booth (12 rebounds).

Even the backcourt had its own taste of foul trouble, as Derek Kellogg (five points, six assists) fouled out and Edgar Padilla, who's 12 points included 3-3 from behind the three- point line, spent most of the second half in foul trouble.

No problem. Mike Williams stepped it up once again, scoring 18 points and knocking down three three-pointers in 31 minutes.

"The last two games — forget about shooting, forget about the moves to the basket, the quickness, the great defense, getting loose balls — he's making everyone on our team better," Calipari said.

"And today, we needed him to do more than make everybody better, we needed him to step up and he did it."

That 31 minutes in a game where Calipari was proud to say they set the pace — a frenzied pace that, when at full throttle, few teams can handle, including Maryland. What's important to the Minutemen is they have a quick and explosive offense, but it's more controlled and less helter- skelter than last year. Proof

Detroit squeaks by Minutewomen

By Candice Flemming

Junior forward Octavia Thomas scored 27 points (11-14 from the field) but it was not enough as the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team fell to the Detroit Lady Titans, 66-65, Saturday in Michigan.

Detroit	66
Massachusetts	65

Detroit sophomore guard Amira Danforth hit two free throws with six seconds remaining to lift the Lady Titans to the victory over the Minutewomen.

The Minutewomen were up 39-38 in the second half, but then Detroit went on a 17-5 run to take a 55-44 lead. UMass came right back with a 16-6 run ending on a Beth Kuzmeski basket to put the Minutewomen on top 61-60.

With UMass down 64-63, Thomas scored on a missed basket with only 28 seconds remaining to give the Minutewomen a 65-64 lead. That would prove to be UMass' last basket as Danforth then hit the two free throws to win it for the Lady Titans.

Thomas had 11 rebounds to go along with the 27 points to complete the double-double, her first of the young season. She also had six steals on the afternoon.

Junior center Melissa Gurile also played well for the Minutewomen, scoring 18 points on 6-11 shooting. She also grabbed four rebounds and blocked two shots. Kuzmeski had nine points, eight rebounds and three assists while Crystal Carroll added seven points.

Detroit had four players finish in double figures in scoring. Autumn Rademacher finished with a team-high 16 points while Sue Bork had 11 points on 5-7 shooting. Danforth and Faith Cyr each finished with 10 points. Cyr shot 4-5 from the field and also grabbed eight rebounds, all on the defensive end.

The Minutewomen's record falls to 0-5 on the year while the Lady Titans improve to 4-2. The Minutewomen will be looking to break out of their five game slump when they host the Providence Lady Friars tonight at 7 p.m. in their home opener at the William D. Mullins Center.

Last year when the two teams met, UMass came away with a hard fought 82-80 victory. In that win, Gurile poured in a school record 38 points on 11-12 shooting from the field and 15-15 from the free throw line. She also garnered three steals. Thomas had 19 points and 13 rebounds in that game as well.

Bob Foley's club finished with a 13-15 overall record last year, 10-8 (fourth place) in the tough Big East Conference. They enter tonight's game against the Minutewomen with a current record of 3-3, 1-0 in the conference. They are coming off a big win against Georgetown University on Saturday 82-63.

Three starters and seven letter-winners return for the Lady Friars. The returning starters are sophomores Mandy Saunders and Nadine Malcolm, and junior Sarah Miller. The 5-foot-7 Saunders averaged 15.2 points and 4.4 rebounds per game last year while the 6-foot-1 Malcolm averaged 12.5 points and 5.4 rebounds. Malcolm has been the leading scorer so far this season averaging 21.5 points and 9.7 boards. Miller at 5-foot-10, averaged 4.7 points and 4.6 rebounds last year and so far this year has averaged 5.7 points and 6.7 rebounds.

The Lady Friars also have freshman center/forward Kerri Chatten from Hopkinton, who should give the Minutewomen problems in the paint. In four games started for Providence, Chatten has averaged 10.2 points and 7.0 rebounds.

Heidi Moyano and Ayanna Walden will also pose a threat to the Minutewomen. Both are averaging in double figures in points so far and in the Lady Friars last game against Georgetown, Walden scored 24 points and Moyano had 11.

UNH hands UM its 11th loss

By Leigh Torbin

Manchester N.H.— For the twelfth time this season the University of Massachusetts hockey team failed to produce a victory Friday night as they fell 6-3 to the University of New Hampshire before a standing-room-only crowd at the JFK Coliseum.

New Hampshire	6
Massachusetts	3

Fueled by a pair of goals from the highly productive Blair Wagar-Warren Norris-Rob Bonneau line, the Minutemen only trailed 3-2 heading into the third period and sensed the possibility of an upset.

A hooking call on UNH co-captain Kent Schmidtke, just 32 seconds into the period, gave UMass added life, but the Minutemen failed to capitalize.

UNH had four quality shorthanded scoring opportunities, while UMass failed to register a shot on goal. Eric Flinton, UNH's top scorer, collected a loose puck, deep in the Minuteman zone, after a failed breakout attempt. Flinton walked in alone, deking goalie Brian Regan for the eventual gamewinner, 1:11 into the UMass powerplay.

"There was a let down on that powerplay that shouldn't have happened," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "The intensity of our whole five man unit just wasn't where it should be."

The Minutemen went 0 for 7 on the powerplay, dropping the team down to a Hockey East low 2.1 percent.

"I think we fell asleep at the switch on the power-play in the third period and the whole momentum of the game changed," Mallen said. "On the power play you've got to play with intensity because if you let up for a second, a good team will just shove it down your throat."

Minutman Norris scored the contest's opening goal 3:52 into the game as he took a feed from Bonneau and fired a shot over UNH goaltender Trent Cavicchi's glove.

UMass' problems started at 12:08 of the first period, when Sal Manganaro received a minor for cross-checking. The puck never left the UMass zone during the ensuing UNH powerplay. At 13:43, a Schmidtke blast from the point deflected off the leg of Wildcat Ted Russell and past Regan.

With the 2,600 fans in a frenzy, UNH scored just 57 seconds later as a low slapshot from Dean Woodman was tipped upstairs and past Regan by Brian Putnam, giving the Wildcats a 2-1 edge as the period closed.

Bonneau tied the game at two at 11:01 of the second. Breaking in two-on-two, Bonneau left a drop pass for Wagar. Cavicchi made a right pad save, but left a rebound for Bonneau, who fired it home.

Mark Mowers put UNH back on top minutes later as he broke past the defense and deked Regan to the five hole.

UMass was handed a golden opportunity as the second period winded down. A Norris shot was thrown out of the crease by a UNH defender and the officials awarded a penalty shot. Bonneau failed to deke on the attempt and telegraphed his shot at Cavicchi's five hole for an easy save.

Things went down hill from there for the Minutemen. Top scorer Norris received an ill-advised ten minute misconduct for using foul language 5:04 into the third, as Massachusetts looked to come back from it's 4-2 deficit.

"[That penalty] took away from our focus," Mallen said. "He said something that he shouldn't have said, and that's something that I've got to clamp down on and we've got to clamp down on as a team. That's not right."

A late Manganaro goal, at 15:41 of the third, was the only saving grace for the Minutemen as they slid to 0-11-1 overall, and 0-8 in Hockey East games.

Even on the smaller ice surface at JFK Coliseum, UNH's speedy forwards were able to fly past UMass defensemen all night long. This problem could have been magnified greatly Saturday night on the Olympic sized ice surface at the Mullins Center.

However, a multitude of problems with the ice forced the cancellation of Saturday's contest after an hour and a half delay. The game has been rescheduled for January 15.

Freedom of speech is topic of speakers policy under review

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has designed a speakers policy, still in draft to protect freedom of expression on campus.

The Rights and Responsibilities of Speakers at UMass Amherst was designed by a work group headed by Deputy Chancellor Marcellette Williams.

Currently, Chancellor David K. Scott is receiving feedback from the University community before he sends it to President Michael Hooker for support, and the Board of Trustees to be voted upon.

The general statement of the draft states the importance of freedom of speech and the Universities' commitment to encourage communication and intellectual discourse.

"Believing speech to be false, deleterious, or in any other way odious cannot be cause for its suppression," reads the policy. "Preventing speech from occurring by disruptive protest also constitutes an attack on freedom of speech."

The policy states it will uphold the First Amendment to the Constitution, but lists allowable exemptions for speech that poses a clear and present danger, obscenity, some forms of libel, child pornography, and words that may lead to physical harm.

Prasad Venugopal, president of the Graduate Student Senate, who was on the work group for the policy, said the meetings did not focus much on those exemptions.

"We did not have a wide ranging discussion on the allowable exemptions," Venugopal said. "I do, however, agree with them on principal, but I believe we needed to have a discussion of these issues before applying them to the draft."

Williams said the idea behind the work group was to propose a draft policy for the Chancellor and various committees for their consideration.

"The Chancellor has sought a wide response for the policy to get feedback," Williams said. "Discussions are still going on on-campus."

Williams said the draft of the Statement on Freedom of Speech that came out of the work group was borrowed heavily with permission from a similar document from the University of Michigan.

The Michigan policy, which is more specific, includes several sections the UMass draft left out.

One section reads, "It is inconsistent with full respect for freedom of speech and expression . . . for members of the University community to exert pressure to revoke an invitation for a speaker to appear at the University . . . and such pressure should be resisted."

Venugopal said he was surprised the section was absent from the UMass policy.

"I think it is unusual that it was left out. It was not the intention of the many members [of the work group] to leave it out," Venugopal said. "The consensus was at its last meeting, that the policy should be very heavily based on the University of Michigan's policy."

Although not specifically stated, the UMass guidelines imply speakers should not be prevented from coming.

The UMass policy also applies more to invited speakers, while the Michigan policy encompasses speakers, as well as artistic impression.

Keith Williams, associate vice-chancellor for University advancement, said the policy focuses on invited speakers, not controversial speakers, because some speakers are more controversial than others.

Venugopal said the policy from UMass is a good document, and in the right direction. But Chancellor Scott has taken too long in coming to this.

"It has taken many months for the Chancellor to come around to reaffirming first amendment and freedom of speech," Venugopal said. "I hope that the Chancellor will move quickly to a decision that this document becomes University policy."

RSO lobbies for finance aid in Washington

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are working to make sure their voices do not go unheard in Washington, D.C.

Students Advocating Financial Aid, a registered student organization (RSO) at UMass, is planning its annual trip to Washington to lobby for student aid, and encouraging students to get involved with legislative procedures.

SAFA, an RSO of 15 years, has a table set up on the campus center concourse that will be available to students all week. They will promote student communication with congressmen, in the midst of recruiting members for their weekend-long bus trip in March, according to Tony Manhart, senior legal studies major and president of SAFA.

"Issues are up in the air, and we're not sure what the new congress is going to do," Manhart said. "If the Republicans' 'Contract With America' is carried out, there will be serious cuts in education, including financial aid."

Students can get the names and addresses of their representatives, and postcards to send to them promoting financial aid, according to Allison Cervini, a sophomore pre- nursing major.

In order to take the trip to Washington, D.C. to lobby for aid, students need to be members of SAFA. Students can receive information about SAFA at the concourse table, according to Cervini.

"We're the only RSO to go down to Washington, represent UMass, and come back and disperse information about financial aid," Manhart said. "It's a group effort between students, administration and alumni."

The program was started at UMass in 1978 through a legislative class taught by political science professor Gerry Grady.

Grady, who has historically been active in politics, lived in Washington, D.C. for three years and ran for Congress in 1958. Grady said he refers to his experiences frequently as a resource to teach the class with.

One of his students suggested the Origins of homosexuality discussed

By Johnatha Erinn Mayer
Collegian Correspondent

On Dec. 9 in the Campus Center, UMass Professor Bonnie Strickland and performance artist Frank Aqueno squared off in a fiery debate, "On Choosing A Homosexual Lifestyle."

Strickland, a professor of psychology, argued the point that a wide range of factors influence one's sexual orientation. Homosexuality is not a choice, but rather something arrived at through a combination of environmental and genetic factors, Strickland said.

"Preference," not "orientation"

Aqueno has toured the country advocating the controversial thesis that homosexuality is a choice, and he used the debate as an extension of this effort. He talked about various observations he had made about his own childhood. These observations led him to believe that his homosexuality was a preference rather than an orientation.

The goal of GLB activists should not be to make people come out of the closet, but to make society a place where people have the option of choosing a homosexual lifestyle, he argued. GLB activists need to "promote, encourage, and recruit homosexuals" to their cause, he said.

Sexual orientation more than choice

Strickland countered this argument with the more mainstream view that sexual orientation is influenced by a wide range of factors. Seldom is it something one chooses, she stated. Strickland based her argument on empirical data from psychology and sociology.

Facility home to women's studies

Five College Women's Research Center creates opportunities

By M. Isabel Tereso
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first of a three-part series featuring Women's Studies programs, facilities and faculty in the Five-College area.

According to Robin Feldman, director of the Five College Women's Research Center at Mount Holyoke College, "one of the reasons that the research facility is distinguishable from other women's studies research facilities is due to its being a multi-campus facility that focuses on women's studies, which is defined very broadly."

A main reason for the creation of the Five College Women's Research Center was to have a forum and place for faculty in women's studies to present their work for all five colleges, Feldman said.

The Research Center is highly recognized nationally and its international recognition is growing, apparent in the number of interested applicants from Germany, Turkey, Israel, Japan and New Zealand. The facility receives many applications every year, which makes a selection of 15 research associates very difficult, according to Feldman.

The application process for research associates is very competitive, and applications are reviewed yearly. The applicants' intended projects or research must clearly have a women's studies focus, regardless of their prior education or background.

The requirements for research associates are that they continue with their defined research project and give a research associates colloquia. These talks are held every Tuesday, and allow research associates to present their current research project to faculty, students and other interested parties. These talks are held at the Dickinson House on the Mount Holyoke campus, are free and open to the public, and begin at 7:30 p.m.

Feldman said that research associates may spend a semester or full academic year with the program, but they do not receive a salary or

The campus pond at the University of Massachusetts may see some changes in the future due to the work of graduate students in the department of landscape architecture.

Proposals to improve the campus pond, titled "Visions of the Campus Pond" will be unveiled at a presentation this week. The proposals were developed during the fall semester by graduate students in a studio class under the direction of assistant professor of landscape architecture and regional planning Dean Cardasis.

"These proposals are intended to expand our thinking about what this important area of the campus could be and to begin the community-wide dialogue regarding the many significant issues in the development of the Campus Pond area," Cardasis said.

The student project for the Campus Pond is the first part of a much larger plan to improve the campus.

The presentation of the graduate proposals comes after the recent establishment of the Campus Beatification Committee. The committee, which is co-chaired by Kathleen Scott and UMass alumni relations director, is a volunteer effort to improve physical conditions on campus.

Last September, the committee sponsored the campus pond cleanup project which is actually part of a much larger proposal to improve the Campus Pond and the surrounding area.

The University presently is planning to hire Denig Design Associates of Northampton for the design and implementation of the overall plan to improve the Campus Pond. Denig won a competitive bid for the project.

"Denig Design Associates is highly qualified and has demonstrated significant experience with these types of projects both technically and in terms of a participatory process," said Associate Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance William Rose. "I was impressed with their enthusiasm and level of commitment to the project."

After establishing a practice in Virginia in 1990, alumna of the UMass graduate program in landscape architecture and regional planning, Nancy Watkins Denig, was the lower bidder at $75,000 for the Campus Pond Project.

Denig designed several projects for the National Zoo in Washington D.C. and played an important role in the design of the Hudson River Park at Battery Park City in New York City.

Denig's work will be paid for with University funds set aside for consultant services that addresses maintenance and design projects on campus. She will head the design which plans to include New England Environmental, a wetlands specialist, and Sara Campbell, a civil Engineer.

Denig will attend Wednesday's graduate student presentation to begin gathering input from the community in the design process for the Campus Pond project. Her final design plans are expected by fall of 1995.

Administration, faculty, staff, students and the general public are invited to attend the graduate students presentation which will be held at Memorial Hall on Dec. 14 at 5 p.m.

Clinton makes 'right' decisions

Centrists and conservatives 'welcome the president's moves'

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In the aftermath of the Republican election landslide, President Clinton is turning his administration to the right on everything from Pentagon spending and tax cuts to a range of moral and cultural questions.

On matters as diverse as postal stamps, medical research and pornography, the president has personally intervened in ways that could help him avoid further inflaming conservative critics.

No one expects Clinton to win over his enemies with limited steps that some see as little more than symbolic gestures. But the president may at least deny his critics new rallying points.

Clinton graphically demonstrated his determination to avoid incensing the right on Friday when he abruptly fired Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders, long a target of conservatives, after she said school children should be taught about masturbation.

That got a lot of attention. But Clinton's shifts on moral and cultural issues have generally gotten less notice than his decisions on economic issues.

Campaigning for the White House, Clinton advocated a tax cut for the middle class but shelved the idea after he was elected. He revived the issue after Republicans made tax cuts a centerpiece of their campaigns last month and seized control of Congress for the first time in four decades.

On defense spending, Republicans also promised a big buildup.

Clinton hurriedly proposed a $25 billion spending increase. And, sparring with the GOP over spending cuts, the administration has floated the possibility of eliminating a Cabinet department or slashing operations.

On lower-profile matters, in the past month alone, Clinton has:

— Pressured the Postal Service to keep alive the tradition of an annual "Mother and Child" Christmas stamp.

— Barred the government from moving to finance the creation of human embryos for research.

— Scrapped government attempts to overturn a child pornography conviction.

— Offered positive words about allowing school prayer, or at least a daily moment of silence, in class.

Earlier, in the weeks leading up to the election, Clinton had uncermoniously yanked the Justice Department out of a case in which it was to argue against a church's claims of religious freedom.

The White House maintains such actions are simply the result of an activist president moving to keep policy in line with his principles, not the fruits of political calculation.

"When he sees an issue about something he feels fundamentally or morally strongly about, he steps in," says presidential adviserGeorge Stephanopoulos.

Correction

In yesterday's Collegian, the story on the funding received for six research projects was incorrect. The recipients of the funding are associate professors and professors.

The Collegian regrets the error.

Textbook Buyback

Students Need to be Paid Higher Prices for Their Books!

We agree! That is why the Annex and the Campus Center Commission have instituted a campaign to get faculty to order their books for next semester now. If faculty submit their order before the buyback starts the Annex can pay 50% of the price of a new copy for books that we need for the spring. If we don't need the book a wholesale company will pay you their price. Since they re-sell those books nationally, the price will always be less than the Annex pays.

"I can't sell it at the Annex unless I bought it there."

Many people think that unless they purchased the book at the Annex they can not sell it back there. Not true! We will buy any book that has wholesale value.

Buyback starts December 15

at the Textbook Annex and our newest location on the first level of the Campus Center - Room 162. At the Hampden Student Center in Southwest we will buy books December 21, 22 and 23.

Rosenberg wants student costs decreased

AMHERST (AP) — Students would have to pay no more than one-third of the cost of a degree at Massachusetts' four-year colleges and universities under legislation proposed Monday by state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg.

"An unstable financing system and tuition hikes have made Massachusetts one of the most expensive states for public higher education," Rosenberg, , D-Amherst, said at a news conference outlining the bill, also sponsored by state Rep. Ellen Story, D-Amherst.

The proposal calls for the state to increase its share of public education funding each year until it reached the recommended split by the year 2000, Rosenberg said.

That would mean that over the next five years the state would have to increase its spending on higher education by at least $200 million, Rosenberg said.

"We can manage that over five years," he said.

When the state ran short of funds in the late 1980s, it sharply cut the amount it had been providing to its colleges and universities and as result tuition and fees at the state schools jumped 112 percent between 1988 and 1992.

Since then the state has restored some funding, but it still provides the schools with less state support than they had in 1988, Rosenberg said.

Currently it costs Massachusetts residents $9,495 a year, including tuition, fees and room and board, to attend the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. For out-of-state residents the cost is $15,841.

The state would have to raise its contribution to the 23,000-student Amherst campus by $139 million over the next five years to reach a point where it was assuming two-thirds of the costs, he said.

Chechnya, Russia begin talks, Russian tanks roll

GROZNY, Russia (AP) — Russian troops pushing toward the heart of Chechnya clashed with forces inside the breakaway republic for the first time Monday, overshadowing the start of peace talks. Despite widespread opposition and several anti-government demonstrations in Russia, there was no sign Moscow was easing up in its biggest military action since the invasion of Afghanistan in 1979.

But the Russians met with much fiercer resistance than when they rolled into the Caucasus Mountains republic Sunday with jets, helicopters, tanks, paratroops and infantry — reportedly as many as 40,000 troops all told.

Forces loyal to the Chechnya government fired rockets at a Russian column of about 250 military vehicles as it advanced toward the regional capital, Grozny, from the northwest. Several Russian soldiers were wounded, the Interfax news agency said, contradicting an earlier report that two were killed.

17 convicts escape Mexican prison

CIUDAD JUAREZ, Mexico (AP) — Seventeen convicts escaped from prison through an 80-yard tunnel so elaborate that it had its own lighting and ventilation system.

The men took three to six months to dig the tunnel, which runs from a cell in the CeReSo prison to an orchard, police said. The inmates, who escaped early Sunday, probably had help from guards or other prison employees, investigators said.

"A breakout that big has to be planned by inside people," said Humberto Uranga, a spokesman for Gov. Francisco Barrio Terrazas of the state of Chihuahua.

The tunnel was wired for electricity and had a long tube connected to a compressor, which apparently was used to feed oxygen into the shaft, officials said.

"Along the whole way there is light, as well as the oxygen line," said Hernan Moya, a police cameraman. "The walls seem to have been chiseled out by a shovel or a pick."

Police erected checkpoints on highways leading out of Ciudad Juarez, which is across the Rio Grande from El Paso, Texas. U.S. officials said they are not stepping up security along the border. Prison officials said they believe the convicts are heading deeper into Mexico.

Drug use among pre-high schoolers rising

WASHINGTON (AP) — Marijuana use among eighth graders has more than doubled since 1991, and researchers blame a more relaxed attitude toward drug experimentation and abuse.

One in four eighth graders said they had used an illicit drug at least once during their lifetimes, 10 percent more than last year, according to a University of Michigan survey released Monday.

The 1994 figure rises to 35 percent when inhalants are included. Thirteen percent of all eighth graders surveyed said they had used marijuana at least once in the preceding 12 months. That was up sharply from 9.2 percent in 1993 and more than twice the 6.2 percent just three years ago.

Increases in use of harder drugs such as LSD and other hallucinogens, stimulants, cocaine and crack were less dramatic. Although this year's overall abuse rates remain below those of the 1970s, there is clear evidence of a gradual upward swing, Lloyd D. Johnston, the study's lead researcher, said during a Washington news conference.

Northeastern plans cuts to trim $5 million deficit

BOSTON (AP) — Despite three years of cuts that sliced $60 million from its budget and 700 positions from its payroll, Northeastern University has found itself with a projected $5 million mid-year deficit.

Deans and department heads were to be given guidelines Tuesday for trimming spending by about 2 percent before the Christmas break. University officials said no layoffs or major reductions in programs were expected. They said different sections of some courses may be merged, some faculty positions left unfilled and expense accounts eliminated.

The university's total budget is $241.5 million.

University spokeswoman Mary Breslauer said the cutbacks may result in "some pinch, but not much pain."

"The life of this university, which is all about education for our undergraduate and graduate students, continues to go on," Breslauer said.

No common source yet for Harvard sickness

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Medical experts have not found the cause of the vomiting and diarrhea that felled about 225 Harvard students last week, but they have ruled out several possibilities, the university said Monday.

Experts from Harvard and the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have ruled out contaminated water as a source of the gastrointestinal epidemic, which had the appearance of food poisoning.

Many of those who got sick Tuesday and Wednesday had eaten at the Freshman Union dining hall shortly before they became ill. But Harvard officials said six to 12 students with the same symptoms have reported to Stillman Infirmary each day since.

The health officials ruled out several common types of food poisoning, including salmonella, because those bacteria did not grow on cultures taken from patients.

They also ruled out botulism and other toxins that can occur in spoiled canned food, mushrooms, shellfish or fish, because the affected students didn't have any neurological symptoms.

Food samples from the Freshman Union are still being tested both at CDC labs in Atlanta and by the federal Food and Drug Administration in Washington, D.C. Investigators are comparing laboratory results with a computer database of 340 questionnaires filled out by both the sick students and a control group of healthy students.

class take a field trip to Washington to see how things work, first-hand, Grady said.

In a matter of days, the students managed to raise the money to facilitate the field trip, and it became a student- run, annual tradition, Grady said.

Each year SAFA goes down and addresses a certain issue, usually related to financial aid, Grady said.

"It's real. Not play acting," Grady said. "It is not an exercise."

The students go down as trained, professional lobbyists, who take a position and have to defend, and lobby for it, Grady said.

Students have to act responsibly and really learn the subject to put it into practice, Grady said. This process has been beneficial in helping students break into politics after college.

"At one time we had six state representatives that were SAFA members in school, and we now have about seven or eight on the Hill," Grady said.

This year's trip is scheduled for March 5 to 7. There will be 47 students participating, Manhart said.

"The new Congress might cut financial aid to college students, and students don't know that," said Peter Luongo, a junior psychology major. "We want to let Congress know that UMass students need financial aid to go to school, and that they shouldn't cut it."

stipend. However, they do receive their own office space, housing, library privileges at the five colleges, and access to computer and sports facilities.

According to Feldman, there are a variety of reasons why there is a strong interest in applicants applying to the Five College Women's Research Center.

"The Five College area is incredibly rich and strong in terms of women's history and amount of people doing work in women's studies," Feldman said. "In addition to the rich resources of the area, involvement in a feminist environment with other supportive and diverse feminist scholars makes the program very attractive."

Professor Jean Grossholtz, director of the Five College Women's Studies Program at Mount Holyoke College said many of the research associates are faculty from other colleges and universities who have taken a sabbatical, and receive some financial assistance for their research projects while at Mount Holyoke.

Grossholtz said she would like to see more women who are currently doing activist work participate in the Five College Women's Research Center. However, she explained that because the program doesn't have money to pay for stipends, many activists are unable to participate because they cannot self-fund their research project. Grossholtz said there is currently a drive to bring money to the Research Center to pay stipends.

Currently, there is no library at the research center that maintains copies of the prior research associates' research projects, Feldman said. Many former research associates have maintained contact with the Research Center and have mailed them completed copies of their research project or publication.

As of this semester, in an effort to increase awareness of the Five College Women's Studies Research Center and its programs, a News Group on Internet has been developed. A list of events pertaining to women and women's issues at the five colleges and in the local area is now more readily accessible.

For further information on this News Group, to be on the Five College Women's Research Center mailing list, or to receive an application for a research associate, call 538- 2022.

The fraud at the top of the heap

Peter J. Orvetti

Rush is gloating.

The intellectual voice of the modern conservative movement is quite happy about the transfer of power inside the Beltway. With his many-chinned throat voicing glee over the radio, and his pompous paunch broadcast into all right- thinking homes across America, Rush Limbaugh is overjoyed.

Rush likes the taste of victory almost as much as he likes 11-pound lobster. But just as Rush lost his dinner, he'll soon lose his followers.

Rush is more than a flash in the pan, and he's more than an arrogant windbag. He is more than a threat to freedom and the disenfranchised, as a few overzealous liberals have argued. Beyond all of this, Rush Limbaugh is a fraud.

That's right. Every day, he spews hour after hour of talk, and he doesn't mean a single word of it.

Well, maybe he means a phrase or two, like "buy my book," or "have a Snapple." Rush is not a Father Coughlin or a Walter Winchell; he's not a political firebrand. He is pure salesman.

Just over a decade ago, Rush had never cast a vote in his life. When he did get around to voting, it was not for his hero Ronald Reagan. He only began expressing interest in politics when he was about to get a radio talk show.

Rush got his start as a publicist for a baseball team. From there, he moved to radio — as sports jockey. In these two jobs, The Great Conservative Hope learned one thing: how to market yourself to the masses.

Rush was ambitious. He sensed growing anger, and made it his meal ticket. He wet his thumb and stuck it into the breeze. The breeze was blowing Republican.

Then came Rush's own breeze — the hot air. This man of modest means embraced the politics of the rich. He started a talk show, spouting Reaganisms and bashing feminists and minoritics in language that would make Pat Buchanan blush.

Demagoguery is always marketable, and soon Rush was national.

Television didn't take long to latch on to this new hero. Like Father Coughlin in the 1930s, Limbaugh saw that dividing people along class, race and gender lines could bring in quite a nice salary.

The untelegenic babbler began his television program, on a set saturated with copies of his own book. (An opus so unreadable that the New York Times refused to review it until Rush's dittohead legions protested.)

After last month's election, the great performer pretended to be overjoyed. In reality, he couldn't care less. Rush Limbaugh is apolitical. The only thing that makes Limbaugh happy is increasing his own stature, not Dole's or Gingrich's, because it means more money.

Rush is a fake. Young conservatives lift him up as a Messiah, and wind up looking like fools. Limbaugh himself has no interest in political power — he's in it for the cash.

Limbaugh probably is a Republican; it takes a certain amorality and cutthroat capitalism to do what Rush does. Selling hate and bigotry without believing in it himself is almost worse than if he did. At least then Rush wouldn't be a prostitute.

In the privacy of his home, Rush reads the letters from his "dittoheads" — his word — and watches senators and candidates talk about him on the news. He checks the best- seller list, and sees that he is number 1.

Then, Rush Limbaugh clicks off the television and turns down the radio. He leans back in his leather chair, lights up another expensive cigar, and smiles at just how stupid America really is.

Peter J. Orvetti is a Collegian columnist.

The political uses of crime

It's time Americans looked honestly at their so–called crime "epidemic." That takes effort, because conservatives have mustered all their lavishly–funded forces — including the television networks, which are mostly in the hands of large conglomerates — to obscure the realities.

Some of these realities:

• The Justice Department's National Crime Victimization Survey shows a 29 percent decrease in total crime in the United States over the past 20 years.

• While the rate of violent crime has stayed about the same over the past 20 years, it is kept high largely by turf wars among urban youth, whose worsening economic condition makes it amazing it is as low as it is.

• One of America's most dangerous environments is the home, where violence by spouse against spouse and parents against child is rampant.

Once again, depressed economic conditions for so many Americans play a major role. These generate rage, especially in males who feel emasculated by unemployment or underemployment.

• Despite declining crime, crime news on the three major networks has increased more than 100 percent over the past year, according to Z Magazine. The corporate executives who control the networks obviously want us to think there is a crime epidemic.

Their reasons are just as obvious: If Americans vent their rage at criminals, then they are diverted from aiming it at the rich, who steal far more from them than criminals do.

The strategy is immensely successful, as demonstrated by the large number of "anti–crime," pro–wealthy GOP candidates who won in the November elections.

A highly pernicious new trend is for criminals and the poor to be portrayed as one and the same. It has little basis in fact, for research has shown time and again that most of the poor strongly support middle–class values.

Americans vent their rage at criminals, then they are diverted from aiming it at the rich, who steal far more from them than criminals do.

Richard H. Gilluly

The trend is particularly frightening because it appears to be aimed at making the poor even more of a scapegoat class than they are now.

An examination of the ambivalent role crime plays in the middle–American psyche is important to an understanding of crime and its political uses in the United States.

While most middle class Americans profess to fear and loathe crime, the truth is often quite different.

For instance, highly popular films such as Thelma and Louise, The Godfather to Cool Hand Luke, and more recently, Natural Born Killers and Pulp Fiction, all take ambivalent stances towards crime, punishment and law enforcement.

In Natural Born Killers, a prison warden and his policeman–rapist friend are as evil (or as screwed up; take your pick) as the criminals. In Cool Hand Luke, a handsome convict is a decent man and his guards are vicious sadists.

It's no accident these films are popular.

That's because middle class Americans, at some level, admire criminals. Indeed, says sociologist Philip Slater, they'd be miserable if there weren't any.

Criminals keep alive for them a dream of rebelling against illicit authority — even of one day having more free and meaningful lives (despite how stupid and empty most real criminals' lives are, as Pulp Fiction sometimes illustrates).

And so when Americans call for stiffer punishments for criminals (punishments, incidentally, which are usually counterproductive) that call represents more than just fear-based vengefulness and a desire to put criminals in cages where they can't harm ordinary good folks like you and me.

It also is a projection of middle–class Americans' own unconscious criminal impulses — or, if not criminal impulses, than at least of the free–floating guilt which is so much a feature of punitive societies like ours. Middle–class Americans want the impulses and the guilt kept at bay, at any cost.

Hating criminals also offers an outlet for the rage middle–class Americans harbor as a result of endless daily humiliations they suffer essentially at the hands of the rich — being insulted by nasty bosses, cheated by doctors, lawyers and insurance companies and put down when they have to kiss bankers' asses to get second mortgages, for instance. It's rage much like the criminals' rage, if only they knew it.

Once in a while, crime and punishment seem simple matters of good people fighting bad people, as in an old Clint Eastwood movie.

In one such case, a former girlfriend of mine in 1988 was attacked on a dark street in Washington, D.C. by two male thugs trying to steal her purse.

Her simple animal rage fueled a battle–royale, which she won because she was a large woman of considerable combative prowess. The thugs went to jail after her shouts brought police.

But little in real life is simple. The police took my girlfriend's purse for evidence. When it was returned to her later, $80 was missing.

Sometimes in real life, as in Natural Born Killers, it's hard to tell who's who in the crime and punishment game.

Don't let scurvy get you down

A.J. Stewart

People are restless. This campus is collectively ready to pack up and go home. Go anywhere is more precise. The break can't come quick enough for students here at UMass. Most people I know are somewhere between moderately and extremely confused. Everyone is looking for answers, and finals haven't even begun yet. It seems we're all upset about something. If what I have seen is anywhere near the truth, we just want to stop being miserable. So if you're looking for answers, I'll let you sneak a look at my paper. But I must warn you at the outset that I don't know what I am talking about.

I don't need to point this out, but this isn't Club Med. If you think Amherst is a vacation paradise, then you are beyond my help. You are in this god–forsaken pit of a town because that's where the school is. You aren't here to drink four nights a week, no matter how close the bar is. You aren't here to find Mr. or Ms. Right, either. You spend a considerable sum of money to attend classes, take exams, and ride the PVTA. Trouble arises when we forget this fact. Or when we oversleep a final exam. Do not skip final exams. Your mother would be disappointed.

The next thing to do is to simply look in the mirror. Not to see if you are the fairest of them all, but to remind yourself of who you are and what you are about. In my humble estimation (subtitled "for what it's worth"), the people who are miserable are mad at themselves for making bad decisions and exercising poor judgement. Remember that no matter how much you beat yourself up, you can't turn a bad decision into a good one. You can only move forward. You didn't bomb Nagasaki or anything. You just need some perspective. Try to remember the good things you've done, and start doing more of them.

The third step is fruit and vegetables. Don't let scurvy bring you down.

A close fourth is laughter. Everyone needs to have a sense of humor, and the ability to laugh at oneself is truly liberating. "This 65 on my macro exam proves that I am among the brightest oxen anywhere." Smiling makes you more attractive, proves your dental hygiene is adequate, and makes other people think you are having way too much sex. So fake it if you have to, but laugh at least four or five times a day. Particularly if I'm telling a joke.

The fifth step is music. There is a debate in my house between the music people and the television people. I am most assuredly a part of the former, and am making it a personal goal to vanquish the TV people. Television is a depressant. You sit mindlessly watching lights flash at you, eating Doritos and getting fat. You might as well take a club and beat yourself over the head to reproduce the effects of television. It makes you dull and stupid.

Music, by contrast, can get you to think, or to dance, and is vastly superior in any quantitative way. This space prides itself on the unabashed promotion of the recordings of Miles Davis. If you're looking for the perfect soundtrack to accompany your romantic interludes, Sketches of Spain is it. If you are alone, take the advice of my friend Eric and buy Carlito's Way. Soon you'll be up and grooving to Kool and the Gang and the O–Jay's, and your soul will thank you. That's the way, uh–huh, uh–huh, I like it, uh–huh, uh–huh (phonetics was never my strong suit).

Books are a part of the content person's diet. Through reading we get a good dose of wisdom and can improve our vocabularies and imaginations. Jean Valjean and I have spent a thousand pages together, and he teaches me something every night. The aimless among us would certainly benefit from a look into literature. The great philosophical questions of our times are asked and answered in books. If you are troubled, turn to books. Not to Hollywood movies, television sitcoms or even Collegian editorials, but to the burning passion of words written by the world's greatest authors.

That's all the advice I have. If you take anything away from this, let it be that things are never as good nor as bad as they seem — unless you are being eaten alive by alligators, which is most assuredly a problem. A sense of perspective will get you through almost anything.

Letters to the Editor

Snowballs cause potential danger

To the editor:

I am writing this very ANGRY letter in response to an incident that happened to my family on Dec. 10 at about 9:30 p.m.

I was driving home from a holiday dinner at a friend's house when suddenly my car traveling on North Pleasant Street was bombarded with snowballs. Not only was my car hit but the car in front as well as the one behind me. The cars were all traveling slowly because of the icy and slick conditions of the road, causing the snowballs to make loud bangs on the passenger side of my car. The sound of the snowballs hitting the car awakened my five–year–old daughter sleeping in the back seat of the car. She started to scream, distracting me and therefore I had to pull over to the side of the road.

I pulled over to comfort my daughter as well as confront the obnoxious, irresponsible and stupid people who threw the snowballs. I was then personally hit with snowballs by one of several students waiting at the bus stop directly across from the Newman Center. There were 50 or so students there and not one of them came forward. Cowardice runs hand in hand with idiotic behavior.

Not only am I a graduating senior at the University but I am a mother. I cannot believe these idiots had the nerve to jeopardize my safety but also jeopardized my family and the people traveling on North Pleasant's snowy road.

I am very active at the University and I am constantly asked by people in my age group how, at age 31, I can stand being surrounded by such young people. I always answer how energetic, fun and intelligent the students are that I have encountered at UMass. I have to say that my answers are going to change dramatically. I also understand that all of the University population is not as moronic as this group. Fifty students do not represent a large sample of the mentality of UMass, but do reflect it in some small way.

I hope that these students realize the ramifications of such a foolish, careless, and immature act of "fun." I am wondering what would have been the reaction from these students if it was their mom and little sister driving the car. I am sure it would be the same kind of outrage and anger that I am feeling now.

Student Judiciary offers explanations

To the editor:

As the Chief Justice of the Student Judiciary, I would like to thank Justin Doyle for his article about us (Collegian, Dec. 9). However, I feel something needs clearing up. The headline "Reinstated Student Judiciary acts as RSO watchdog" was misleading about the Judiciary's function. In essence, we are a regulatory agency designed by undergraduates, but we derive our responsibility and power from the Trustees. Sure, we deal with matters that are internal to the SGA, RSOs and agencies, but we also have jurisdiction over acts of the SGA that affect University policy.

I am not writing because I want to be picky. I am writing this because it is important for students to know that the reactivation of the Student Judiciary is another victory in the fight to empower students and regain control of aspects of the University that are our areas of primary responsibility.

Along with such great things as the reactivation of SCERA, the regaining of litigation rights for Student Legal Services, and the official recognition of the SGA constitution by the trustees for the first time in 25 years, the insitutions for students of the Commonwealth to have a voice and vote in their University are slowly falling into place, and every student should know.

Also, the article did not tell people who are having a problem how the Judiciary can help them. If anyone has a question or feels that they might have a case, please come see me or the Student Attorney General at the SGA office in 420 Student Union or the free attorneys of SLSO in 921 Campus Center. We want to help and can walk anyone through the steps.

Disclosure: misogynist thrills with P.C. sheen

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

DISCLOSURE
Directed by Barry Levinson with Michael Douglas, Demi Moore
Donald Sutherland & Dennis Miller

Poor Michael Douglas. He seems to be making a career out of playing oppressed White guys, whether he's being persecuted by psychotic mistresses (Fatal Attraction), psychotic biscxual serial killers (Basic Instinct) or everybody else (Falling Down).

His latest vehicle for detailing White–male oppression is Disclosure, a prickly tale of sexual harassment where Douglas is the victim of sexual blackmail by his former flame turned new boss (Demi Moore). While the film delivers its high–concept thrills with almost methodical obviousness, there's one thing that makes Disclosure different than the rest: it's the first politically–correct misogynist thriller.

Douglas plays a computer company executive who is passed over for a promotion during an upcoming important merger. The company's head (Donald Sutherland) appoints Douglas' former girlfriend (Moore) the new vice president. Which is fine for Douglas, except when, after a late meeting, Moore forces herself on Douglas, goading him into rough sex.

When he refuses, all hell breaks loose: suddenly she's claiming sexual harassment and Douglas' job is on the line. So he hires a hotshot female lawyer to defend him while receiving anonymous tips from "A Friend" on e–mail (anyone who can't figure out who "A Friend" is almost instantly should be sent back to cliche school to brush up on "This Character Seems Extraneous Now..." 101).

Message movies and corporate sex thrillers don't go very well together, so it's fun to see director Barry Levinson (Jimmy Hollywood) try to be pro–woman while relentlessly demonizing Demi Moore's viperous lady boss. Disclosure comes redi–made with an overflow of "positive" women characters that serve as a built–in rebuttal to its own misogyny. Which makes it an interesting contortion, if not a successful one.

Demi Moore's one–note performance makes it easier to hate the character than to understand her...as in last year's Indecent Proposal, her breasts are more expressive than the woman who paid for them.

And so the plot thickens — with the consistency of lumpy gravy — brightened up by the appearances of she–devil Moore, as it does with these kinds of movies. Moore's just okay here, mainly because her character is a complete cipher; it's a role that demands shades of bitchy venom be expressed through evolving hairstyles.

A better actress could've brought some pathos to the role, but Moore's performance makes it easier to hate the character than to understand her. At one point the character infers that she's been planning her vengeance for years and you almost believe her, mainly because there's nothing behind this statement that projects anything more than Moore's one–note scowl allows. And as in last year's Indecent Proposal, her breasts are more expressive than the woman who paid for them. (See what spite this movie incites?)

While Michael Douglas is making a career out of playing in these types of "controversial" movies, it's getting a bit old. In Disclosure, Douglas doesn't even try for sympathy — he's going for the postage stamp for bathos. He recites lines like "Sexual harassment is about power (duh). When did I have the power?" with such absolute piety. It'd be pathetic if it wasn't so funny. And when the film delivers its smiley–faced ending as some sort of feminist triumph, you can practically see the movie pat itself on the back — although, I'm not really sure. I was grueljing too loud.

Okay, okay, I've made my point. But the question remains: aside from the ridiculous plotting, hammy acting and irrelevant social themes, is it a good movie? It has the potential for being a trashy guilty pleasure, if that's what you mean, but no, it's not. Don't be fooled by its pseudo– feminist righteousness, Disclosure pretends to be about hot– button issues, but it's really the same–old sexist, psycho– bitch themes in politically correct drag. C

Joshua Redman Quartet dazzles full house at Bowker Aud.

By Tracy Kruger
Collegian Correspondent

The Joshua Redman Quartet played to a full house in Bowker Auditorium on Dec. 8. The show sold out two months in advance and those fortunate enough to get a ticket were in for a treat.

The jazz quartet is headed by tenor saxophonist Joshua Redman, who has received some serious attention as a young talent. Having only been committed to a professional career for three years he has already had phenomenal success.

As a musician, Redman respects both the innovation and tradition of jazz, and both can be heard in his music. However, Redman asks his audience not to intellectualize jazz, rather he insists that they simply listen and feel. Thus, the songs he writes are very melodious and moving.

The quartet simply makes it all look easy. Their strength is the ability to combine their diversity, creating a full bodied swing. Collectively, the four members have a playful sense of humor and comraderic that makes both listening and watching their performance uplifting.

Quartet member Christian McBride demonstrated his brilliance that has made him one of the most sought–after bassists in jazz today. He was both a powerful backbone for the band and an innovative musician. He improvised complex and diverse solos that kept the audience on their toes.

On the piano was Brad Mehldau, who Redman introduced as "incomparable." Rightly so, Mehldau's style is intriguing. His playing is sporadic, but extremely well placed. He often echoed melodies with a teasing twist demanding attention. His distinct interpretation contrasted with the other players' brings various dimensions to the overall feel of the music.

The quartet tastefully covered Stevie Wonder's Be Sure That You're Sure which was played as naturally as the songs written by Redman himself.

Mehldau's relaxed style is very different, and even balanced by the energetic drummer, Brian Blade. Blade is a machine, with every part of his body, from his earlobes to his toes in unforgiving rhythm. He often had to lean forward and pull his drums back to him at the end of a song.

The standing ovation brought Redman and McBride back on stage to play their signature duet, Sunny Side of the Street. They lighthearttedly challenged each other with difficult riffs while Redman showed his silly side with nursery rhyme quotations. Redman and his quartet left the audience on the up side, showing that they were successful in fulfilling their sincere efforts to entertain. An act like this is sure to go a long way.

'Disclosure' harasses 'The Santa Clause'

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Disclosure, starring Michael Douglas and Demi Moore as his sexually harassing boss, debuted as North America's top box office draw over the weekend, earning an estimated $10.1 million, industry sources said.

The film bumped Tim Allen's blockbusting holiday entry, The Santa Clause into second place at $8.9 million, and easily outpaced the $6.4 million debut of Drop Zone, starring Wesley Snipes as a federal marshal who infiltrates a sky–jumping band of bad guys led by Gary Busey with the help of Yancy Butler.

The figures are based on studio estimates of ticket sales Friday through Sunday. Final figures were released late yesterday.

1. Disclosure	$10.1 million.
2. The Santa Clause	$8.9 million.
3. Drop Zone	$6.4 million.
4. Junior	$2.9 million.
5. Star Trek Generations	$2.8 million.
6. Interview With the Vampire (He) Law Down Dirty Shame	$2.3 million.
8. The Lion King	$2.2 million.
9. Miracle on 34th Street	$1.5 million.
10. Trapped in Paradise	$1.3 million.

Laughter & pathos make this play one great 'Escape'

By Chris Hassett

ESCAPE FROM HAPPINESS
Curtain Theater
Dec. 10

For all the people out there with Donna Reed for a mother and who's father always knew best, Escape From Happiness was definitely not for them. Everyone else with a not–so– perfect home life could sit back and be thankful that their parents were never this bad.

The audience was kept laughing throughout the play, from Junior (Ken Ward) lying on the linoleum floor of the kitchen, beaten, to Nora (Dee Waterman), his mother–in–law is giving him psychological first aid. The laughs continue when Mary Ann (Robyn Bruderick) is distressed at finding out that her sister, Elizabeth (Marissa Matrone), is not a lesbian but is bisexual, and ending with a closing conversation between Nora and Tom (Harry Mahnken) about what job would be best for him.

In a nutshell, Escape is the story of a family pulling together in time of need. Elizabeth, the oldest daughter and the one the family always calls when they have a problem, is trying to find out who beat her brother–in–law, and why police found drugs in her mother's basement.

Tom, the dad who abandoned the family for 10 years only to return later under the guise of senility, is attempting to give back to the family he hurt so long ago by cleaning up his crime–ridden neighborhood. Nora, the neurotic mother many of us may be more familiar with than we would like to be, must deal with the overly harassing police while trying to keep her daughters from fighting amongst themselves.

Director Edward Golden has given this seriously wacky piece exactly what it needs. The set is the busiest room in anyone's house, the kitchen — complete with linoleum floor and formica counter–tops. The cast is nearly flawless, knowing when to get melodramatic (which is often) and when to make a cool exit (also often).

Dee Waterman, as the neurotic mother Nora, is only barely sane, serving up a constant opinion with the perfect "listen to your mother" voice. She plays Nora as a kind–hearted mother who can forgive everyone of anything, except the man who was once her husband and is now only referred to as "the man who you think is your father."

As the oldest daughter Elizabeth, Marissa Matrone's character takes after her dad. Although she claims that Dad's drinking and quick temper make it hard for her to forgive him, when the going gets tough Elizabeth reaches for the scotch and throws a tantrum just as quickly.

Rachel Solomon plays the conspiring police officer, Dian Black, who believes the ends to justify the means. The character takes after Lilith from the popular sitcom "Cheers" with her educated assessments of the situation at hand and arrogance when offering them. The character was meant to be cool, calm and collected, and was, but she was never anything else. Dian Black had a lot of potential to be the most sane–looking crazy person in the performance, but Solomon, while genuinely trying, never seemed to find her rhythm.

This is a wonderful production that makes standing ovations a must at its comically brilliant conclusion, though the play did contain heavy amounts of profanity that may have crossed the line from everyday use to pure shock value.

While the audience laughs at Elizabeth's tantrums and Mary Ann's unique way of looking at the world, they are reminded at the same time of the imperfections of their own family. When watching Escape from Happiness, one either laughs at the craziness, or is frightened by its familiarity. A–

Room 307: Weekly hip-hop culture

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

"We're trying to show what real hip-hop is about," said Ibraham Ali, co-host of an increasingly popular television show on campus.

"Room 307," produced by the Union Video Center, has just completed its third semester, with juniors Ali and Mike Butler, and sophomore Chris Noel at the helm. Filmed every Thursday night in Ali and Butler's Gorman Residential Hall room (hence, the title), half of the hour-long program is dedicated to providing a unique and wholly unrehearsed look at Black issues at UMass and beyond, while the other half is comprised of current music videos.

The show's unpredictability is virtually guaranteed each episode: A topic is never revealed to the audience before taping.

"We try to pick topics so that no one will feel discriminated," Butler said.

Both Butler and Noel attended Springfield Gardens High School in the Queens section of New York, from which they both originate. Noel graduated a year behind Butler, and followed his friend to the University, where Butler and Springfield native Ali had already become acquaintances.

"When Chris came up here, we all just got together," Butler said. "And we were like, 'Let's come up with a talk show.'"

Their initial exploits, according to Noel, consisted of filming strange events in the dormitory with a camcorder, but soon progressed to a more serious level. UVC Vice-president Yusef Lateef, who also produces and edits the show, took an interest in the three students' energetically conceived vision, and thus "Room 307" was born.

"When we first came out, our image was basically trying to have fun," Butler said. "But now that we've gotten this far, people are starting to ask real questions. So now we're starting to develop a new image."

"Everything's a lot more loose this year," Ali added. "There's less nervousness and tension."

One of the major changes implemented is the addition of interviews with professional recording artists, such as Dionne Farris, Gravediggaz, Beatnuts, The Fugees, Common Sense and Artifacts.

However, perhaps the greatest success came when "Room 307" featured Top 40 rapper Craig Mack as a guest.

"We just really chilled with him," Ali said.

After graduating, the trio all have major career plans. Surprisingly, only Ali has plans to remain in the entertainment industry.

Already under a production and management contract, the rapper Ali, whose stage name is "Fifth Letter," envisions himself as a producer, manager and performer in years to come.

Butler sees himself settled down with a family and owning "a couple of little businesses." Noel aspires to work for a marketing firm or company with a marketing division, and aspires to own a brownstone in Harlem.

For the time being, however, they plan to focus on "307" and the responsibilities that come with the program.

"We're like an Amherst 'BET'," Butler said.

The last raft: One person's response to the continuing Martin lecture debate

I'm writing to respond to a letter that was recently printed in this newspaper in which a student described his experience at the lecture given by Professor Tony Martin. Many of you probably read this letter and were outraged by what he described, and this was perfectly understandable. I, too, was outraged by what I read, not because of the horrible descriptions of blatant anti-Semitism, but rather because of the lies, generalizations and overdramatic exaggerations it contained.

Professor Martin's lecture was hardly a "Nazi rally." People certainly weren't chanting "Heil Hitler" or screaming out for Jewish blood. If anything, most of the audience sat quietly and listened; in fact, the only people shouting and behaving like fascists were a small number of Jewish people in the audience. They shouted names at the professor while he was speaking; one person shouted, "We're gonna get you."

When members of the audience politely asked them to be quiet, they refused and shouted such things as, "We have free speech, too."

Some of them even attempted to intimidate other members of the audience by getting in their faces and saying such things as, "What, you got something to say to me?" I witnessed one man doing this several times and he even went so far as to threaten a handicapped person sitting in front of him; at one point, he grumbled, "I pay money for this school. I don't have to listen to this crap."

You may ask yourself why he came at all.

It would seem that he and his companions came for other reasons than to cause disruptions and enrage everyone around them. Instead of simply protesting outside, as any civilized person would, they decided to bring the fight inside and behave like schoolyard bullies. I noticed that the writer of the letter completely omitted these actions; that's funny, because isn't Tony Martin attacked for his "selectiveness" in stating the facts?

While the writer failed to detail the behavior of the Jewish people in the audience, he was fairly graphic about the behavior of the Blacks. After a description of some of the claims made by Martin, he states that "these are just a few comments made by Professor Martin which led the Black students to give him several standing ovations, as well as heckling approval to most of his remarks."

First of all, the writer makes a severe generalization when he says "the Black students." Not all the Black students applauded the professor's comments, and there were not "several" standing ovations. In fact, the only noteworthy standing ovation came after comments, made by a Black student during the question-and-answer section of the lecture, which were in no way anti-Semitic. He also failed to mention that this ovation included most of the audience, even those who weren't Black. The only people doing the heckling, as I mentioned above, were the Jewish people in the audience who were being disruptive.

That passage in the writer's letter is a very deliberate distortion of the facts meant to give the reader a false impression of the Blacks who were present; in fact, it is meant to portray them as "Black Nazis." Sound familiar? Perhaps it sounds like a certain professor who twists historical data to portray Jews as "conspirators." The writer says, "As a Jew at UMass, I feel threatened;" well, sir, as a so-called "Black Nazi," I don't feel particularly comfortable walking around campus these days, either. He says, "These events have contributed to a sense of harassment and intimidation on campus."

Well, sir, your letter, full of distortions, exaggerations, lies and deceptions, certainly didn't contribute to a sense of tranquility and peace on the campus.

The writer and people like him are constantly attacking people like Louis Farrakhan and Tony Martin for their taking of information out-of-context, their distortion of facts and figures, their inflammatory generalizations, and so-called anti-Semitism; yet, they themselves seem to find no problem in using such tactics. They want respect for their ideas and opinions, but see no need to respect those of others. They constantly complain about the insult they feel.

Well, sir, I am insulted by your letter.

I am also insulted that some people seem to feel that simply because a "small percentage" of Jewish people were involved in the slave trade, that it is somehow acceptable, that it shouldn't be mentioned and addressed.

If even one person was involved in the enslavement and degradation of another human being, then it is a horror that should be held up in the light for the whole world to see and denounce!

If even one Jew was executed, then it is a horror that should be held up in the light for the whole world to see and denounce!

Yet, people like you and Martin like to quote figures and numbers and statistics as if they were more important than human beings. "More of our people suffered than yours, so our suffering is more important" is the mentality. It's that sort of ignorance and twisted thinking that put us in slave ships and you in gas chambers in the first place.

To the writer of the letter, you are no better than Professor Martin. You are both cut from the same cloth and you both deserve the same criticism. I encourage the students of this campus to stop blindly choosing sides, to realize there are villains in both camps, and to align yourselves with the truth. Be careful not to simply accept what you're told, but rather to always keep searching for the truth. In a sea full of people like the writer of the letter and Martin, the truth is the only life raft that any of us have.

Embrace it and cling to it.

UMass picks up its first victory of the season

Thomas, Mitchell spark Minutewomen in decisive victory over Lady Friars

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Led by the play of forward Octavia Thomas and point guard Sabriya Mitchell, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team won its first game of the season.

The Minutewomen beat a tough Providence Lady Friars squad, rather decisively, 64–52, last night at the William D. Mullins center.

Thomas, the 5-foot-9 junior, played outstanding, scoring a team-high 21 points while also pulling down a game-high 14 rebounds, tying a career high. Thomas scored most of her points underneath where she grabbed five offensive rebounds. She constantly beat Providence's taller frontcourt players to the ball.

Massachusetts	64
Providence	52

"When she's in there she's looking to score," Providence Coach Bob Foley said. "She takes it to the basket, she was driving a lot, drawing a lot of fouls in the first half. She is a great player. She plays with intensity."

Mitchell had perhaps the best game of her collegiate career. The 5-foot-3 sparkplug scored six points on 2–3 shooting from the field and 2–2 shooting from the free throw line. But more importantly, the sophomore only turned the ball over four times and dished out a game-high eight assists. In the first five games of the season, Mitchell had turned the ball over 33 times, so this game was encouraging for her and Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien.

"I think the key was Sabriya," O'Brien said. "She has been struggling with decision making and I thought she made great decisions tonight. Sabriya controlled the game. She played the entire second half and I think that was the key more than anything.

"I think this is the first time this year that she's had more assists than turnovers and so this is a big day for her."

Melissa Gurile had another solid game scoring 14 points and grabbing seven rebounds. She started out slow scoring only four points in the first half, but stepped it up in the second.

Crystal Carroll was the third Minutewomen in double figures in points, with 10. Freshman Kara Tudman contributed eight rebounds while Beth Kuzmeski scored eight points and had six rebounds.

UMass led throughout, taking the lead with 8:25 left in the first half and keeping it from there on out.

At the end of the first half UMass was up 30–22. Providence's Nadine Malcolm had the hot hand for the Lady Friars in the first half scoring 17 of the team's 22 points. She scored her team's first 13 points on two three pointers and 3–3 shooting from the foul line. She also grabbed eight rebounds in the first half.

"In the first half I was really pumped. I wanted to go out there and get things done," Malcolm said. "My teammates, no matter how hard they tried, couldn't get things done so I had to pick up the slack a little."

"The fact that she had 17 of our 22 points in the first half upset me a lot because you can't win when you have one person scoring 80 percent of your points," Providence Coach Bob Foley said.

With the scored tied up at 11 with 10:12 left to go, UMass went on a 12–3 run to take a nine point lead, 23–14. The Minutewomen built that lead on 7–8 shooting from the foul line to go along with a Kuzmeski three pointer and a Thomas layup.

In the second half, UMass broke it wide open. The Minutewomen took an 11-point lead early on, 43–32, and never let up, not letting the Lady Friars come within 10 points for the rest of the game. UMass led by as much as 19 points twice.

Malcolm cooled off in the second half scoring only five points. Her low point total in the second half was triggered by UMass' tough defense and Foley's desire to spread the wealth.

"We weren't really looking to go to her in the second half. She's part of the offense but we needed other people to step up," Foley said. "Kerri Chatten stepped up in the second half. Heide Moyano finally hit a couple of threes, but we were just inconsistent. We made mistakes on offense, on defense and had silly turnovers, and I think that's what cost us the game."

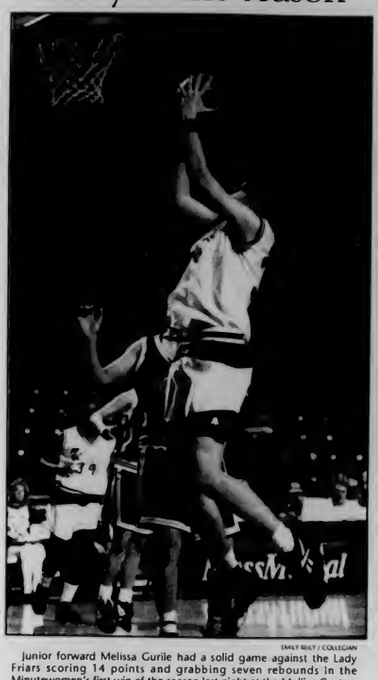
Turnovers were indeed a problem for the Lady Friars as they committed 18 on the night.

"We could've pulled [the win] out," Malcolm said. "We didn't communicate as we should've and could've, and they came out hard. They wanted it more than we did and they got it."

"We just didn't play with any intensity and that's what disappoints me the most," Foley said. "UMass wanted it more than we did and they took it. They came out with emotion. They outplayed us, outworked us on the boards and they deserved it."

UMass' record improves to 1–5.

"I told them the other day at practice that this was our most important game of the year," O'Brien said. "I think we needed it more than anything for ourselves. We're a good team. [But] we can't win with just Octavia and Melissa, they're going to lead us but we need other people to step up."



EMILY BELT / COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Melissa Gurile had a solid game against the Lady Friars scoring 14 points and grabbing seven rebounds in the Minutewomen's first win of the season last night at the Mullins Center.

Many factors play a part in UMass' first victory

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team entered last night's game with a disappointing record of 0–5, and a season, once so promising, was beginning to look bleak.

But the Minutewomen changed all that last night at the William D. Mullins Center with their 64–52 (it wasn't even that close) win over the Providence Lady Friars.

In the first game on their home floor, UMass outscored, outrebounded, outhustled, and flat outplayed the Lady Friars en route to picking up their first win of the season, and turning their downward plunge around.

> "We expected a war. UMass wanted it more than we did, and they went out and took it.
> —Bob Foley

For the first time, UMass fans got a glimpse of the Minutewoman team they were looking forward to watching this season. Yes, this game was different from the rest.

For starters, there was Octavia Thomas. The junior forward scored 21 points, but even more importantly, she grabbed a game high 14 rebounds, and asserted herself as the leader that UMass needs out on the court.

"Octavia rebounded the ball very well," Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Her points are her points, but her rebounding, that's what makes her a special player."

The junior seemed to be under the basket after every play, battling the taller Lady Friar front line for every loose ball.

"I'm just working on chasing the ball," said Thomas, whose 14 rebounds tied a career high.

"Thomas just played 100 percent the entire game," Providence Coach Bob Foley said. "She is just a great player who plays with great intensity."

There was also good ball handling, as sophomore point guard Sabriya Mitchell, playing in her first collegiate season, turned in her best performance to date running the offense. Mitchell, who has had her problems with turnovers until last night, collected eight assists, with only four miscues.

"Sabriya had been struggling with her decision making, and she made great decisions tonight," said O'Brien. "She needs to have more assists than turnovers, and she did that tonight. In fact, they only had one layup off her turnovers. That's what she has to do."

"We've been working on passing," said sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski, who chipped in four steals on the defensive end. "We weren't making as many stupid turnovers."

Another key for the Minutewomen was the defense that kept the Lady Friars, who were averaging 85.8 points per contest coming in, to only 52 points.

In the first half, there was only one player that UMass could not stop. Providence sophomore Nadine Malcolm, who came in averaging over 21 points per game, had a monster first half, scoring her team's first 13 points. In fact, it was not until freshman Julie Wheeler sunk a free throw at 5:58 left in the first half, that another Lady Friar got in the scoring column.

But the Minutewomen responded to that challenge as well, holding Providence's leading scorer to only five points in the second half.

"We made sure we found were she was, and tightened up on her," O'Brien said.

But in the end, it came down to desire, and last night, UMass had plenty of that.

"I knew Joanie's kids would play hard," Foley said. "We expected a war. UMass wanted it more than we did, and they went out and took it. They just didn't quit."

The Minutewomen may be 1–5, but they proved to themselves, if nobody else, that they can play with that level of intensity that is needed to win basketball games.

Second place Pats making playoff run

Toward the end of each season, the NFL quickly begins putting together the schedule for the following season.

The process includes having the weaker teams in the league supposedly get an easier schedule than the upper echelon of the league.

Why bring this up now?

Because as the Patriots, who finished in fourth place last season, begin to make their playoff run, they are playing their final two games in Buffalo and in Chicago. Forget the fact that these games are on the road.

I would make a bet that if I were to poll the 28 teams in the league, most would say that the two worst places to play in December are Buffalo and Chicago. Sure, a few places might be able to match up (Cleveland, Denver), but this is not what I call rewarding a fourth place team.

Anyway, the greatest part about this whole scenario is that the Patriots love to battle adversity. That's what Head Coach Bill Parcells is all about. In fact, I am sometimes led to think he purposely puts his team in an adverse situation by giving the ball to Marion (nothing) Butts (one yard) on first and second down. And when Drew Bledsoe bails the squad out on third down, it builds character. And there's no dobbt that the 1994 Pats have character.

At least that's the way I see it from Section 307, where I was located for the third consecutive Sunday. If I could only explain to you the electricity that surrounded Foxboro yesterday — before the game, during the game and after the game.

It started on the way to the stadium when, on WBZ radio's pre-game show, the Pats and the playoffs were being discussed together in the same breath. Someone even had the audacity to mention a home playoff game in Foxboro. Home? For the playoffs?

The excitement then carried over to the tailgating lot (which we'll get to later), where fans invited the biting cold conditions in order to barbecue before what many tabbed "the most important game of the season." Continuing up from the tailgating lot to the stadium (a lengthy 1.2 mile trek), the fans began to get a little rowdy.

"Faulk you Colts! No Faulkin' way you're coming out of here with a win," were a few of the chants coming from the sidewalks of Route 1 as many fans were forced to dump out their open containers of beverage. Their minds were on Colts running back Marshall Faulk, and how the Pats defense could stop this battering ram.

Then came the entering of the stadium and the main attraction of the day, the game itself. The usual cast of characters were up in 307 to help analyze it, including Double R, Doogie, Stinky, Stuie, Link, Jolly Rancher Man (featuring assorted flavors) and Al.

Link was his usual calm self on this chilly afternoon, even after the Pats fell behind 10–0. Stinky was, well...Stinky. And Stuie has now been promoted to defensive coordinator of the section. For every time the Pats need a big play on defense, he gets up, calls it, and then it happens. Double R was in rare intense form with his portable radio on his head, feeding the section the scores of the day. Of course, we all kept a close eye on the Buffalo–Minnesota matchup. Doogie was all jacked up, as was Al, who was worried about tendinitis in his shoulder due to signaling too many first downs.

The Pats came back to win, and all was joyous in the heaven of Section 307.

At the end of the game I peeked my head up toward the NBC announcing booth were I screamed to Beasley Reece (no relation) "Hey Beasley, you gotta' believe baby, you gotta' believe! Playoffs!" He nodded his head in approvement, and I was fired up at the response.

Then came the walk back to the lot where more talk of the Patriots surfaced. I'll tell you, there's energy in Foxboro.

Now, before we get to the day's events of tailgating, we need to span a quick rolodex of the mind: The Steelers are the hottest team in the AFC, with the Pats a close second. . . The 49ers are exploitable, but few teams have the personnel to do so . . . Philadelphia is a sad story, and a good coach (Rich Kotite) is going to be out of a job next year . . . Nice to see Seattle win after last week's horrifying accident off the field . . . Arizona, although 7–7, has scored the second fewest points in the NFL, right in front of Houston . . . Looks as though Jimmy Johnson is going to end up in Tampa Bay.

Finally, Sunday's tailgating day was a special one, because Double R and Co. were joined by a few of the best. Scotty and his boys made the long trip to our lot, and if they were still in the Tailgater of the Year contest, this one would be a tough one to call. Scotty's tailgate was certainly a good one.

It started with the appetizers, supplied by UMass grad, Rich. Chips and salsa, chips and dip, bread and dip, and to top it all off, shrimp cocktail. It was laid out on a nice table, along with four chairs. The beverage selection was also plentiful, featuring bottles, cans and a Minnesota Viking Horn (a unique addition) to drink from.

The main course (plump burgers), which believe it or not was marinated on the way to the game as Scotty merged on and off the highway, was cooked on a more than competent grill. The company was more than adequate with Louie and Bill playing major roles.

Mention must be given to the home base of the tailgate, the Scotty-mobile, which has an installed paper towel rack.

And of course, the staple of the lot, Double R, put on his tailgate as usual. All in all, it was a great day. And today, there is no Top 5, because Scotty has been issued a re-entry form to the contest that must be returned by next week. If he re-enters, the contest takes on a new shape.

One thing's for sure, everyone involved hopes there's at least one more time to tailgate, perhaps at a home playoff game. Who would've considered that just one year ago?

NBA checks out Roe, Camby

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Barring serious injury, when the NBA gathers in the Skydome in Toronto for the draft, in all likelihood, Lou Roe will be the first player from the University of Massachusetts to walk up to the podium as an NBA draft pick since Julius Erving. Depending on when Marcus Camby decides to move on, he too is likely headed for the pros.

At Saturday's UMass–Maryland game, scouts from 13 NBA teams were in attendance to watch Maryland's Joe Smith, Camby, Roe, and anyone else who might emerge as a sleeper.

Roe was projected as a late first round pick if he had decided to enter the draft pick last year, but with a strong showing in the Goodwill Games, playing against international competition, and Dream Team II, in addition to tremendous performances in the first two games against Arkansas and Kansas, with both games on national TV, many believe that Roe has improved his draft position considerably.

Charlotte Hornets' scout Dave Twardzik said that Roe's relentless work ethic and heart make him an attractive choice to scouts in the NBA.

"With Lou Roe, the thing you love is his heart," Twardzik said. "He's a guy with a big heart and he works hard. He's fearless."

The biggest question mark surrounding Roe is what position he will play in the NBA. He is one of the nation's top collegiate power forwards, but at 6-feet-7-inches, Roe would be small for the position in the NBA. He would have to adapt to the small forward position.

"It's a tough position for him," Twardzik said. "He might be like a three-and-a-half. That might be his downside. He doesn't have a true position, but the thing is, a guy that works that hard [and] gives you it every night, there is a chance for him. The down side is his size, but he plays bigger than he really is."

Indiana Pacer scout Terry Knight thinks that Roe can make the transition.

"I don't know if his size is going to hurt him any," he said. "He's going to have to put the ball on the floor a little more, and shoot a little more from the outside playing in the NBA."

Camby's defensive presence has intrigued scouts, but after his 32-point performance in a losing cause in the NCAA tournament against Joe Smith, many experts began considering Camby a future lottery pick.

"With Camby, you're intrigued. He can run, he can block shots. He can get much stronger," said Twardzik, who thought Camby would also change his position. "I think he's a four [power forward]. His size is really an advantage. His strength is a little bit of a disadvantage, but because he's so big, it kind of offsets it a little."

Knight thinks that Camby would benefit from adding weight and muscle to his slender frame.

"[Putting on weight] will help him," Knight said. "Going up against some of the power forwards in the league, he's going to have to hold his own."

For Camby, the question remains whether or not he'll stay four years or enter the draft early like so many before him.

"I haven't really thought about it," Camby said before the season. "A lot of people are saying I might be leaving after this year or next year. Right now I'm committed to myself, my teammates and my family to stay four years and get my degree."

Vandalism, sexual activity still plaguing UM library bathrooms

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

There have been no further reports of extreme vandalism and sexual activity in the men's bathrooms in Thompson Hall since they were closed in October, but the W.E.B. Du Bois Library continues to deal with similar problems.

The problems consist of lewd graffiti that included solicitation of sex, damage to University property and facilities, and sexual activity conducted in restrooms, according to police reports.

Reports of similar incidents plague the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, primarily on the 19th floor.

"The Physical Plant and Environmental Health and Safety is working to detect any graffiti and identify graffiti, or vandalism, as quickly as it occurs," UMass Police Chief John Luippold said.

The most recent report of sexually explicit graffiti in those areas was on Dec. 11, Luippold said.

The last report of sexual activity in the library was on Oct. 24, when two men were allegedly engaging in sexual activity in the 19th floor men's room, according to police records.

Sexual activity is only one of the things happening in the restrooms, according to Grant Ingle, vice chancellor for human relations. The major problem is damage to the facilities.

Detailed graffiti similar to the type of information found in personal ads was discovered in mid-October. It included solicitations for sex and made mention of the 19th and 22nd floors, according to police reports.

Some of the consequent graffiti, like writings reported on Dec. 5 in the Tower Library, has been homophobic.

Although this type of damage has been reported throughout the semester, it had been occurring before the semester had even begun.

"Glory holes" — holes in partitions dividing bathroom stalls — were drilled in one of the library's restrooms, and the Physical Plant was called in to repair it after an incident took place in mid-August.

A man allegedly pulled out paper that had been stopping- up the hole and looked at the individual sitting in the connecting stall, according to police reports.

Other damages had been reported prior to the semester.

Graffiti advertising oral sex was found in a certain stall in the 19th floor men's room last June, according to police reports.

Approximately a week after this graffiti was documented, there were two reports of homosexual sexual activity in the same bathroom.

In the first incident, the subjects left before officers arrived on the scene. Two days later, officers found two men engaging in sex in one of the stalls, according to police reports.

"Both in Thompson and the library, we are continuing sporadic patrols with uniformed and un-uniformed officers," Luippold said.

Internet virus proves to be a hoax

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Recently, thousands of computer users worldwide received a warning about an e-mail-borne computer virus floating around the Internet. But the virus known as "Good Times" turned out to be a hoax, according to a memo released by the U.S. Department of Energy's Computer Incident Advisory Capability (CIAC).

The e-mail message informed computer users that any message from America OnLine, a commercial on-line system, was carrying the virus. Supposedly the virus would have deleted the user's hard drive if the e-mail message was read.

Messages with "good times" in the title were also considered suspect of carrying the virus, as well as messages with "xxx-1" in the title.

The Good Times virus hoax was started by users on America OnLine and an unknown university system, according to the CIAC report.

Karyn Pichnarczyk, CIAC team member, said she believed thousands of users worldwide had received the warning.

According to Duncan Chesley, director of Computing Administration at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the hoax posed no problem for Office of Information Technologies.

Chesley said the hoax did not dramatically increase Internet traffic.

"People who are knowledgeable in this area thought it [the virus] was questionable," Chesley said.

It would be difficult to transmit a virus through e-mail and there have been no reports of such computer viruses to date.

"Executing code can cause a virus, but e-mail does not execute code," Chesley said.

Programs like software packages execute code while files like e-mail and word processor documents do not execute code.

According to the CIAC report, an American OnLine user received the warning and proceeded to scan his computer for viruses, and indeed found one.

However, the CIAC dismissed this one report as a fluke because the user had not scanned his computer for a few months.

"Just because it was a hoax, people should still be more aware of viruses," Chesley said.

Students can obtain virus protection software from Personal Computing Support Services in 203 Goodell, according to Allison Finck, administrative assistant at PC Support Services.

For Apple Macintosh users, PC Support Services has a shareware software package known as Gate Keeper Disinfectant which costs only $3.

For PC users PC Support Services offer a commercial software package known as Mcafee which is compatible with both Windows and DOS. Mcafee costs $20, which provides continual free upgrades as new viruses are discovered.

Speakers policy reaffirms First Amendment

Suggested restriction on 'harassing series' rejected in favor of free expression

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

Despite the concerns of some members of the community, the proposed speakers policy for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst does not target controversial speakers but reaffirms First Amendment rights and the University's commitment to freedom of speech.

A draft memorandum obtained by The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, written by a subcommittee of the Task Force on Anti-Semitism and Jewish Awareness, called for a mechanism to deal with a "series" of guest speakers on campus that harass target communities.

The subcommittee memo was intended to be sent to Chancellor David K. Scott and Deputy Chancellor Marcellette Williams but was turned down by the full task force.

"This campus too frequently experiences a series of speakers and events that targets a specific group, attempting to create hostility and disdain toward that group," reads the draft. "Such events, which may be called 'series' events, can and should be considered a form of harassment."

According to David Bloome, co-chair for the task force, the memorandum was discussed at a task force meeting but was never sent to Scott or Williams. Williams was assigned by the chancellor to create the work group that drafted the speakers policy, titled "Rights and Responsibilities of Speakers."

"We have sent no memos concerning this issue at all," Bloome said. "It was not agreed upon by the task force."

Graduate Student Senate President Prasad Venugopal, a board member of the speakers policy work group, said he had seen the memo prior to policy meetings. Venugopal also said that other members of the work group may have read the memo.

"I know of at least one other person on the work group who has seen this draft [memo]," he said.

David Schimmel, a member of both the task force and the policy work group, said he did read the draft memo but the topic was never brought up at the policy meetings.

"I think it's a fair question to be raised," Schimmel said. "I think it's appropriate to discuss other issues, like a question and answer period [for an invited speaker]. But that's not necessarily appropriate for the speakers policy."

Like Venugopal, Schimmel was invited by Williams to serve on the work group.

Bloome said the task force hasn't even heard about the speakers policy work group meetings until later.

"Marcie Williams' committee, when it was formed, the task force was never told about it," Bloome said. "The task force was not asked to be a part of it. If they were, it would have come through me as a co-chair. I want to make it clear though, I did not take it as a slight."

Williams said the work group does have representation from the task force.

"I believe David Schimmel is on both groups," said Williams. "We did not request various task forces to send us representatives."

Schimmel said he did not know why he was invited, but possibly because he teaches a course on this subject.

Bloome said he cannot speak on behalf of the task force because they have not taken any action yet. He also said he is not very familiar with the draft policy, but does want the University community to come together when any group comes under attack.

"It is appropriate for the University community, this includes leaders in faculty, students and staff, to recognize in the course of over four or five years, that one particular group has come under attack under multiple occasions by celebrity speakers brought to campus," Bloome said.

"I would hope that the community would come together to reassert its values and is concerned when any group comes under attack."

Scott said he welcomes feedback from the University community about the policy. The draft will next be sent to University President Michael K. Hooker and then to the Board of Trustees who will vote on the proposal.

Peter Pan drives to help support local food bank

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

Peter Pan Buslines of Springfield will be donating 25 cents to the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts for every bus ticket purchased in Springfield, Amherst and Northampton this month to support those in need this holiday season.

"Thousands of young families and elders in our communities cannot make ends meet. They need the help of The Food Bank to keep the cupboards full," said Peter A. Picknelly Jr., president and chief executive officer of Peter Pan Buslines.

"We are proud to work together with our passengers to provide The Food Bank with financial assistance during the holiday season."

Over 360 programs receive food from The Food Bank, which distributes 2.5 million pounds of food each year to emergency pantries, survival centers, shelters, soup kitchens, day care centers, low-income elder sites and other human service providers.

About 114,000 people receive assistance annually, half of whom are children.

"The Food Bank is grateful for Peter Pan's commitment to our fight against hunger, especially in these times of limited resources," said Catherine D'Amato, executive director of The Food Bank.

"As people travel to visit friends and family during December, they can ride knowing that a portion of their fare will bring thousands of pounds of food to those in need."

The Food Bank is a non-profit charity organization, said David Sharken, The Food Bank's director of programs. The Food Bank receives minimal funding from the government. Over 85 percent of The Food Bank's funding comes from private sources, said Sharken.

"With increased cuts in government funding, we had to get creative on how we were going to get additional funding," said Sharken.

The Emergency Food Assistance Program, a federal commodity program which appropriates money to purchase goods for direct distribution to emergency feeding programs, has been cut 85 percent in the present budget, and is likely to be phased out in the present congress.

The Food Bank will lose $60,000 through the present budget cuts, according to D'Amato.

Over 13,000 tickets are expected to be sold from the Springfield, Northampton and Amherst Center terminals during the month of December, the busiest travel time of the year.

"As well as raising money, we are also raising awareness," said Sharken.

Mt. Holyoke professor encourages critical thought

By M. Isabel Tereso
Collegian Staff

Editors's note: This is the second in a three-part series focusing on women's studies programs, facilities and faculty in the Five College area.

Professor Jean Grossholtz has been teaching women's studies at Mount Holyoke College since 1970. She is currently chairwoman of the Five College Women's Studies Program at Mount Holyoke College.

Grossholtz's area of expertise is Southeast Asian politics, and she has taught various political development courses. In 1970 she and Susan Bourque of Smith College taught their first women's studies course, entitled "Sex and Politics."

Grossholtz said she sees her position in the classroom as a facilitator, not a dictator. She said she encourages her students to challenge themselves and their thinking, which helps them become more critical and analytical thinkers.

Despite her encouragement of students' critical thinking, Grossholtz said she suspects that one-third of the faculty at Mount Holyoke consider her classes to be a party line for feminist male-bashing, which she denounces wholeheartedly.

Grossholtz said she believes that her purpose as a professor is to assist students who may express anger toward men. She said she attempts to go beyond the anger, to analyze why criticized behavior continues. Grossholtz added that she has always gone out of her way to introduce different ideas, conservative as well as liberal, to her students.

Women's studies programs are needed as a balance, according to Grossholtz, because much of what is still learned and taught is from the male perspective. She believes a well-rounded education should consist of opportunities to look at the world from a feminist perspective.

There are attacks on women's studies programs coming from a variety of areas, according to Grossholtz. The criticism from some feminist theorists is that women's studies programs focus exclusively on White women's concerns, ignoring women of color and indigenous women's concerns.

According to Grossholtz, gender issues aren't independent of race or class. She said that it's important to recognize that race, gender, class and oppression are interrelated, and need to be studied as such.

In the mid-'70s, Grossholtz helped organize a Five College Women's Studies Committee to discuss the integration of women's studies into other areas of study, such as race and class. Meetings were held, and interested faculty became involved, said Grossholtz.

There was some debate, according to Grossholtz, as to whether different departments would offer separate courses regarding Black women, for example, or whether they would incorporate Black women's issues into the already existing curriculum.

It was decided to encourage each department to add women's roles, achievements and history to the already existing curriculum. However, by the late '70s and early '80s, a separate women's studies curriculum was created.

According to Grossholtz, the current women's studies department works with many other departments. There are drawbacks that come with an interdisciplinary program, she said, one of which is the lack of money available to recruit new faculty.

Another drawback she reported is that many of the women's studies faculty members are hired by other departments. At times a faculty member might need to take a temporary leave from the women's studies department to fulfill another depart-

Dollar holds at over 100 yen

LONDON (AP) — The dollar was mixed against other key currencies in European trading today. Gold prices advanced.

In London, the dollar was quoted in late trading at 100.30 Japanese yen, up from 100.00 late Monday, and at 1.5708 German marks, down from 1.5733.

At midday in New York, the dollar was worth 100.12 yen and 1.5692 marks.

Other late dollar rates in Europe, compared with late Monday: 1.3304 Swiss francs, down from 1.3333; 5.4133 French francs, up from 5.4095; 1,639 Italian lire, down from 1,648; and 1.3869 Canadian dollars, up from 1.3865.

The British pound was quoted at $1.5605, down from $1.5640. In New York, the pound fetched $1.5612 at midday.

Other dollar rates at midday in New York included: 1.3277 Swiss francs, 5.4065 French francs, 1,636 lire, and 1.3860 Canadian dollars.

Stocks end mixed; inflation fears end

NEW YORK (AP) —Stocks ended mixed today after indications that the economy remains strong.

The Labor Department said inflation at the wholesale level rose 0.5 percent in November.

Private economists, however, had forecast the increase and said it did not show a worrisome rise in inflationary pressures. It reflected, they said, a bounce back after two straight months of unusually low price pressures.

The PPI had fallen 0.5 percent in both September and October, the first back-to-back declines in wholesale prices in three years. In a second report, the government said retail sales climbed 1.2 percent, about twice as fast as had been expected.

The Federal Reserve is watching the economy's movements as it prepares for its final interest-rate meeting of the year on Tuesday. The central bank has already nudged rates higher six times this year hoping to slow the economy and forestall inflation. Stock investors like to see rates fall because that cuts the cost of money to company and makes shares more attractive relative to interest-bearing investments.

Crop prices fall on slow trading day

CHICAGO (AP) — Wheat futures prices fell sharply Tuesday on the Chicago Board of Trade on signs of slackening export demand. Other grain and soybean futures also weakened.

Wheat's tumble erased four days' worth of gains as expectations for a large sale of U.S. wheat to Egypt faded. Prices had risen recently on talk Egypt was preparing to bid for 300,000 metric tons of U.S.-subsidized wheat.

"The smoke-and-mirrors enthusiasm we've had here about renewed sizeable export business turned to disappointment when nothing on the Egyptian front surfaced," said Jerry Gidel, grains analyst with Dean Witter, Discover & Co.

Bicycle Co–Op shutting down; hopes to regroup

By Henry Brier
Collegian Staff

The Bicycle Co–Op at the University of Massachusetts was forced to close its doors last week but some of its members of the hope it will only be a temporary measure.

The Center for Student Businesses (CSB) closed the Bicycle Co–Op in the Student Union last Wednesday.

The co–op was closed because of disorganization, insufficient involvement in management and lack of business, said junior mechanical engineering major Eric Kamila, who was the co–op's bookkeeper.

"We don't have enough people willing to manage the bike shop," he said.

Kamila said for the past three semesters he has not been paid for the "average three to four hours a week" he put in the bike shop as bookkeeper, member of the co–op's steering committee and the bike co–op representative to the board of businesses.

The co–op is available to all cyclists, said Kamila, including mountain bikers, racers and tourers who travel with backpacks. He said that when the co–op was doing well these cyclists pursued service and saved money by learning how to fix their own bikes.

"We have to fix the managerial problems before we can implement any profitable ideas," he said. "The bike co–op does not exist for profit, but we need enough income to sustain ourself as a competent business.

"We can reopen as soon as we can show Student Businesses that we have enthusiasm and can run the business professionally," he said.

But to reverse the closing, Kamila suggested that "people with an interest in business as well as cycling" should contact the CSB or himself.

In the Comparative Annual Income Statements & Summary of Operations report dated Oct. 31, the CSB analyzed the co–op's business practices of 1990–1994. They also itemized vulnerable areas where losses had been felt.

The past year was cited in the publication as "the worst financial year in the past five years." They attributed the dismal finances to "the loss of the three of the four–member steering committee in December ['93] resulting in loss of guidance in the spring."

Kamila said the co–op was run most efficiently in "the late '80s." During this time there was consistently a "15 to 20– member staff" that was "enthusiastic and they were into it and [they] put a lot of time into advertising," he said.

In the publication the CSB recommended that the co–op's Steering Committee be effectively restructured to assume four "critical tasks."

If there were four members of the Steering Committee they could oversee the roles of inventory, purchasing, bookkeeping and advertising, wrote the CSB.

"We emphasize education," said Kamila. "We don't just take the bike and fix it. We teach people how to fix it so they can come back and rent tools."

Also recommended in the CSB publication was the generation of "greater revenues." One of the "new methods for creating [a] positive cash flow" listed is consignment, the sale of used bicycles and parts.

Textbook Buybback

Students Need to be Paid Higher Prices for Their Books!

We agree! That is why the Annex and the Campus Center Commission have instituted a campaign to get faculty to order their books for next semester now. If faculty submit their order before the buyback starts the Annex can pay 50% of the price of a new copy for books that we need for the spring. If we don't need the book a wholesale company will pay you their price. Since they re-sell those books nationally, the price will always be less than the Annex pays.

"I can't sell it at the Annex unless I bought it there."

Many people think that unless they purchased the book at the Annex they can not sell it back there. Not true! We will buy any book that has wholesale value.

at the Textbook Annex and our newest location on the first level of the Campus Center - Room 162. At the Hampden Student Center in Southwest we will buy books December 21, 22 and 23.

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

WOMEN making WAVES

Abortion info in Ireland?

Women in war–torn Ireland could see more liberal abortion laws in the future. Health Minister Brendan Howlin said the law prohibiting distribution of information about abortion clinics in other countries would be amended in legislation to be considered by the Cabinet this week.

The legislation is expected to pass despite the strong Roman Catholic affiliation in Ireland.

Abortion is an extremely emotional issue in Ireland, where 95 percent of the 3.5 million citizens are Catholic, divorce is constitutionally prohibited, and legal distribution of condoms is severely restricted.

Northampton woman honored

A Northampton woman was recognized recently by community leaders, peace activists and supporters for 27 years of community service.

Frances Crowe, 76, retired two weeks ago from her position as the Western Massachusetts coordinator for the American Friends Service Committee. Crowe ran the organization out of her basement at home.

Her accomplishments include helping to organize a local contingent for the march on Washington led by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in the early 1960s, combatting racism in the anti–apartheid movement and joining in the struggle to disengage the United States from conflicts in Latin America.

"People have come to feel that war is not the answer, that killing one another solves nothing," Crowe said. "We have to find non–violent means to settle our differences and I am glad that more and more people are beginning to agree."

High school harassment

Two years ago, Abby Gray, a sophomore at Newton North High School, faced the taunts of her peers when they called her "flat–chested" and made other rude comments.

When she told her teachers of the harassment they ignored her complaints. "No one knew what sexual harassment was," she said. "No one cared."

Finally someone listened.

Newton North High School teacher Rosanne Perlmutter gave rise to a program allowing students to voice their stories and reenact their experiences in a 20–minute home video titled Sexual Harassment and Self Esteem: Facing Up to Harassment.

The school showed the video to more than 400 students, with panel discussions following each presentation.

"With a subject like sexual harassment, so sensitive and so subjective, it is very difficult to get people to understand what you are talking about," Perlmutter said.

Nothing outlasts the UMass crew team

Artie Ashton of the University of Massachusetts crew team took his turn at the rowing machine on the way to breaking the world's record for continuous indoor rowing yesterday. Participants have taken turns rowing in one–hour shifts since Dec. 1 and plan to stop on Dec. 15. The team has already rowed the equivalent of more than 2,700 miles and is shooting for approximately 3,000.

There is a current effort underway to encourage recruitment of new faculty, including women of color, who would also teach in the women's studies department, Grossholtz said.

The lack of funding for women's studies also strains the existing faculty, Grossholtz said. She is currently teaching three courses in addition to maintaining her position as chair. If she didn't teach these courses, she said there would not be enough courses available to majors.

Grossholtz said that serving as the chair has allowed her to make independent decisions and ensure the smooth operation of the Five College Women's Studies Program. Likewise, she said the interdisciplinary program allows students the opportunity to develop their own majors within women's studies, focusing on their interests rather than the department's or faculty's.

In addition to her academic duties, Grossholtz is actively involved with various organizations in working against violence against women.

American Eagle plane crash kills 15 in North Carolina

MORRISVILLE, N.C.(AP) — An American Eagle commuter plane carrying 20 people crashed and split in two about four miles from Raleigh-Durham International Airport on Tuesday. Fifteen people were killed.

Flight 3379 was en route from Greensboro to Raleigh-Durham, a flight of 70 miles, when it went down in a rugged, wooded area about 6:40 p.m. It was foggy and a steady drizzle was falling at the time.

Seven people were taken to hospitals, but two died a short time later. Of the five survivors, at least two were suffering extensive trauma, a hospital official said.

It was the second crash of an American Eagle plane in less than two months, but it did not involve one of the ATR planes the airline recently grounded amid concerns over the planes' safety in icy conditions.

Supposed joy of the holidays

"So are your parents going to be there?" I asked rather timidly.

"Yeah," he said.

"Is that OK?"

"Yeah, it's Christmas you know, everything's swept under the rug, no one talks about it." He began imitating the typical relative greetings of smiles and handshakes. "Everyone will be in and out with their 'Hi, How are you?!' . . . no bruises," he smiled with a shrug.

His endearing smile couldn't erase the fact that what he had just said wasn't funny. In my mind it was actually sad. But he was right, Christmas is like a big broom and family issues are like the fallen pine needles swept under the presents. Arguments, separations and flying punches are covered by bright lights, ribbons and holly. Everyone smiles, everyone swallows their pride, and everyone seems contained in their own winter wonderland glass ball that snows when you shake it. Christmas is like a loud whistle during a football game — all play stops.

E.C. Thomas

I am certainly no different than anyone else — a swig of egg nog and a roasted chestnut later and I could easily be mistaken for a character in a Norman Rockwell painting. But when my friend commented, "It's Christmas, no bruises," without the slightest bit of dulling in his bright blue eyes — the concept of this universal facade struck me.

As joyous as the holidays are made out to be, there will always be a sort of sadness that is hidden under all this reality wrapped up in ribbons. Sadness and loss are supposed to be cured with the anticipation of St. Nick and nine reindeer (including, of course, Rudolph). But the strangest part is that nearly everyone is in on it. Entire families participate in the denial like it's a contest. The first to lose the smile is the Grinch.

To me the holidays are a reminder for how anti-Brady Bunch things are. Which is not to say that there aren't joyous moments, like my dogs opening up their presents with the same vivaciousness I used to as a kid, or the smell of my mother's cooking coming from the kitchen, or the reunion of old friends — or any of the simple things that make me smile. But when I take a step back from all the seasonal glitter, it becomes almost surreal. Things are missing from the picture.

My grandparents no longer sit by the fire with us, a few of my friends can no longer call, and my Merry Christmas greeting to my father is done over the phone and usually not without a harsh word.

When you start to notice the things that used to be close to you are gone, the holidays become such a time of reflection that the burden of acting happy through it all is a performance worthy of an Oscar.

I don't look at the holidays as a time for self-pity and I certainly don't dread them — after all I've been a pretty good kid this year, and I think Mom noticed — but I also can't sit here and say how excited I am to go home. In fact, as I write this the more my throat seems to tighten up, I suppose after a while all the hype of merriment becomes tiresome for me.

The holidays are supposed to be a time of joy given and shared with your loved ones. I guess I've never been able to reconcile with the fact that no amount of jingle bells will drown out shouted words, no amount of mistletoe can cover up the bruises, and no matter how good you've been Santa can't bring your loved ones back.

Solution to social ills is education

On a recent Saturday while preparing to go to brunch with friends, I turned my television on to WOCH. The music I heard playing appalled me because it was skinhead music with extremely racist overtones, so I immediately turned it off.

A few days later while cruising the information superhighway I found on the Usenet a subject about Jewish humor. I opened the subject, expecting to read people's opinions of Jewish American comedians like Jerry Seinfeld. However, I was once again horrified to discover that it was just a posting of anti-Semitic jokes too vile to even repeat on these pages.

Matthew Wurtzel

I was disturbed by these incidents and other similar incidents of anti-Semitism and hate I have had to face.

I began to think about censorship, but that is against most of what I stand for as a writer who exercises his free speech rights every day. I realized that the solution to curing unfounded hate and prejudices does not lie in the form of laws barring free speech, but in education.

Most open-minded people would agree that education is the solution to many problems in today's society. Here at the University every student is required to take diversity courses which intended to broaden and open our minds to other cultures. However, these diversity requirements are not going to open or broaden the minds of the deejays on WOCH whose views have already solidified in their minds.

People hate what they fear. The reason bigots fear other groups and individuals is because they are different then the bigots. The bigot hates Jews because Jews do not believe Christ was the messiah, therefore making the Jews different. The bigot hates African-Americans because of such superficial qualities as a different skin color. The bigot hates Asians because not only do they look different, but they have a dramatically different culture.

Because hatemongers learn their hate when they are young children, courses at the university level are not the solution and anyone who believes university courses can change bigots is a naive fool. The solution is not education at the university level, but a continuous program beginning in the early years of education up through high school: a program of classes used to teach children to be sensitive towards people of other races, nationalities, creeds, ethnicities and religions.

The University could help the Commonwealth prepare such a program. The numerous departments in the humanities, social sciences and education could assemble an experimental program in the local school systems to help teach children the importance of understanding rather than hate.

After the experimental period the University should use the information gained and prepare a recommendation to the state on how to modify the curriculum in the public schools throughout the state.

An educational diversity program in K-12 would eventually drop the number of hate crimes in the state which would free up space and time in the courts and prisons.

Society would benefit in innumerable ways from such a program. Such a program could potentially become an example for the other states.

However, until the Commonwealth and the University take action, hate will fester like an open sore on society.

Letters to the Editor

Heterosexual ally supports gay awareness

To the editor:

The Gay Awareness Day rally a few weeks ago was a tremendous success made possible by a group of students in my psychology class, "The Lesbian Experience."

Of course many gays, lesbians and bisexuals came to show their support, but it was the turnout of heterosexual allies that really surprised and pleased the rally organizers.

As a heterosexual ally and a member of the spon-soring class, I was asked to show my support by wearing purple or a little rainbow "ALLY" pin.

I made a decision that wearing an "ALLY" pin would be a kind of cop-out. I am not lesbian or bisexual, but I wanted to do something more than just show my support.

I decided that wearing a pink triangle would do a lot better to give me a taste of being a homosexual in a society dominated by heterosexuals.

The pink triangle is a symbol of oppression and is widely used within the GLB community. Even though its significance is not recognized in all communities, I figured that wearing it at UMass would provoke some kind of response.

So I put on my pink triangle pin. To anyone who didn't know me but knew what it meant, I was a lesbian or bisexual woman. With a fluorescent pink triangle on my black blazer, I faced the world for the first time as someone different.

I remembered an exercise in high school when a group of White students painted their faces black to conceptualize being a minority. Back then I was too preoccupied with being part of the majority to worry about the minority.

When you know you are different, it is hard to tell the distinguish between mere paranoia and overt prejudice. Nevertheless, me and my pink triangle got stared at.

My pink triangle was right there when I approached a T.A. with a question after class, and it was no paranoia that made me notice the way he stared at my pin with such surprise. I had to repeat my question.

Some of my friends broke into peals of laughter when they saw me and my pin behind the tables at Gay Awareness Day.

The biggest gap to bridge between heterosexuals and people in the GLB community is that heterosexuals like me can never know what it is to be different.

As a 21-year-old college senior, I was still frightened to wear that pin, still worried that people might think I was a lesbian.

I challenge everyone to in some way alter yourselves so that you feel different and are looked at differently by all who see you.

Strolling down memory lane

With a mere seven days remaining in my UMass career, I find myself staring down the barrel of the obligatory memories column. Like nearly every columnist before me, and surely every other following, I can't resist the urge to encapsulate my entire eight-year (or so it seems) UMass experience in one neat, witty, 70-line package. So without further ado, and with all apologies to Dave Letterman, I present the Top 10 things I'll miss about Our State U.

Derek Milosavljevic

10. The W.E.B. Du Bois Library. Say what you will about its sinking from the weight of the books and the sweltering heat: tell your friends at other schools you've got a 26-story library and notice their jealous faces. And you've gotta admit those elevators really fly.

9. Dining Commons. Two words: chicken hoagies.

8. Women's athletics. From softball to field hockey, soccer to volleyball, these are the unsung heroes on campus. These student-athletes play for the love of the game, and play better than most of our men's teams. Keep an eye on the tennis squad, the next rising power.

7. Antonio's. Legendary. At 2 p.m. or 2 a.m., the best slice of pizza around. UMass students showed their loyalty to the last chance pick-up spot last year when a competitor moved in and was squashed like a crucial Minutemen third down play.

6. The Daily Collegian. I'm not getting all mushy about writing for the paper, I'm talkin' about reading it. Chicken hoagies (see #9) just wouldn't have been the same over the years without the humor of a few things: Jim and his journal, and certain editorial columns.

5. Rafters & Charlie's. These two will always be linked in my heart like Larry and Magic. They carry on the tradition of excellence, on opposite ends of town, pushing each other to be the best. Charlie's has 25-cent pizza slices, Rafters counters with half-price Monday night appetizers. You say Rafters has Keno? Charlie's comes right back with "Darling Nikki" on the jukebox. The two could have received a much higher ranking but I don't want people to get the wrong idea.

4. The Student Union steps in spring and fall. If you like to people watch, this is the place to be. Green hair, navel rings, daisy dukes, they're all right here, and in few clothes.

3. Coach Cal. The man has style, the man has class, and he's not a bad little coach, either. Cal and I rolled into Amherst within a year of each other, and this little berg hasn't been the same since. While he likes to hog most of the credit for the basketball team's turnaround, I bear him no ill will. One request, John: Kiss and make up with Rafters. Once a favorite spot for his coach's shows and postgame meals, Cal has left the bar for more upscale digs. I, for one, haven't been more crushed by a breakup since Burt and Loni called it quits. Remember the wings, coach. Remember the wings.

2. Parking Control Officers. Actually, more likely they'll miss me. I take no responsibility for future tuition increases resulting from the University's loss of several hundred dollars brought in each semester from my parking adventures. To the folks at a local towing establishment, and they know who they are, two words: daily shower. Try it.

1. I had a really hard time with this one. Letterman always finishes with a clunker and I hate to fall into the same trap. I could get sweet and say "all the friends I've made here over the years." I could be a pig and say "babes," or something to that effect. While both hold a special place in my heart, I refuse to say I'll miss them. For if I learned anything in my time at UMass, it was that life is not worth living without friends and babes.

Derek Milosavljevic was a Collegian columnist who never uses the word "babes" in real life.

The political wheels keep on turning

David Nash

On the surface, last month's election may seem like a good thing to registered Republicans like me. Bob Dole became the Senate Majority leader and Newt Gingrich is now Speaker of the House. This is an opportunity for both of them to see if the changes they have been speaking of can work.

These aren't the changes that worry me. However, there are three committee changes that do have me nervous. Strom Thurmond gets armed services, Al D'Amato gets finance and banking, and Jesse Helms gets foreign relations.

Al D'Amato has long been after President Bill Clinton in regards to Whitewater. There is speculation that D'Amato will use his chairmanship to go after the president, leaving all other concerns behind. There are any number of crises that D'Amato could go after — the senate banking scandal or the savings and loan scandals. Paul Sarbanes of the joint economics committee and Henry Gonzalez of the house banking committee have both proposed legislation making the Federal Reserve more democratically accountable. D'Amato could throw the weight of his committee behind these ventures. He won't.

Strom Thurmond has been in the senate for what seems like forever. He takes over armed services at the age of 95. That seems like a little too old to be in the senate, never mind on the armed services committee. This has to be one of the most important chairs in the senate and in an age when every budget cut is aimed at the military, it would seem to take a younger person with new ideas to keep up. This is not Strom Thurmond.

Foreign relations and Jesse Helms. Those are two phrases I would never put in the same sentence. Helms is the symbol of the "good ole boy" network. In his last re-election bid, he ran against a Black man, Harvey Grant. Helms and his re- election committee used every dirty trick in the book. It was one of the nastiest campaigns I have ever witnessed. At the time it divided North Carolina. You were either for Helms or against him, there was no middle ground. This is not someone who should be involved in foreign relations, unless he is given round-the-clock aid just to keep him from uttering ethnic slurs that boil under the surface.

The next group that bothers me is the presidential wanna- bes. The '96 list so far has Bob Dole, Lamar Alexander and Phil Gramm on it. Dole has made quite a number of enemies on both sides and will most likely go down in defeat. Lamar Alexander — no one outside of Tennessee and the Department of Education has ever heard of him. Phil Gramm is the person who worries me most. Since 1988, he has seemingly forgot that there are states other than Texas.

Gramm was one of the authors of the Gramm–Rudman–Hollings act that basically cut out the heart of the military. Yet when it came to base closings and realignments, all Gramm had to say was, "Not in Texas." Hypocritical, if you ask me. One candidate I have failed to mention is Dan Quayle and I don't know if he is serious or not. Listening to radio and television news, it would seem that he has support, but he has too much following him to be a viable candidate.

Sam Nunn had armed services. He is not a Republican but has done a terrific job. Now that he is not on a committee, it's possible the secretary of state job could be open to him. Colin Powell is another for the job and 1996 is not that far away. The political wheel keeps on spinning, and where it stops, nobody knows.

The trouble spots in our nation's capital keep on brewing.

David Nash is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please TYPE your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

Sunny Day Real Estate shines in triple–bill concert

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

SHUDDER TO THINK
SUNNY DAY REAL ESTATE
BRAINIAC
Student Union Ballroom
Dec. 12

This past Monday night, the crowd in attendance at the Student Union Ballroom for University Production & Concert's last event of 1994 were witnesses to proof that the band with the most hype does not always necessarily deliver the best performance.

Although the triple–bill was headlined by Washington D.C. luminaries Shudder To Think, it was the comparatively obscure Sunny Day Real Estate who clearly stole the show.

Wedged between Shudder To Think and opening act Brainiac, Sunny Day Real Estate took the stage discreetly but quickly made the most lasting impression of the night.

The non-descript, conservative appearance of the band's members (clad in plain white T-shirts) could not have contrasted more strongly with the incredibly emotional music they produced. By the end of their first song, they had won over virtually the entire crowd, the majority of whom had clearly never heard the band before.

Drifting, atmospheric melodies shared equal time with soaring, passionate vocals and uncommonly precise musicianship to create elaborate songs that were truly enchanting.

Only a year after their formation, Sunny Day Real Estate displayed the near-perfect power and beauty that Billy Corgan and company only wish they had live.

Sunny Day Real Estate proved to be an extremely tough act to follow for headliners Shudder To Think. Plagued by musical inconsistency and the pretentious vocal stylings of singer/guitarist Craig Wedren, the band's set was a mixed bag, with a similarly split crowd response.

During one song, Wedren openly mocked the hammy stage antics of big time "alternative" stars, staring vacantly over the crowd's heads and contorting melodramatically with the microphone. This all would have been much funnier, however, if his band's music did not fit in so easily with the same genre he was ridiculing.

Considered hardcore innovators in their earlier Dischord days, the band's more recent material has taken on a much more traditional, alterna–rock feel. Still, as moody college rock goes, Shudder To Think are still musically as solid as they come.

Unfortunately, it's hard to notice this when Wedren is getting carried away by his experiments in operatic singing techniques. Not since Living Colour's Corey Glover has a frontman tried so hard to call the spotlight to himself via inappropriate vocal styling. Sadly, the band suffers for it.

Opening the show was the noise-mungering outfit Brainiac. Although ostensibly from Dayton, Ohio, these guys sounded more like they came from another planet — one where distortion and effects pedals determine greatness.

Swirling guitars and screeching vocals typified a set in which potentially addictive melodies were lost to a jumble of dissonance, punctuated by a keyboard which emitted sounds like a video game. B+

Indie compilation best bet in this week's reviews

TWICE REMOVED Sloan
DGC Records

Where have all the stylings that made British and American pop of the 1960s so, well, poppy, gone to? If one were to address this question, a good answer would be that the twangy sounds that once lived in the tunes of bands like The Turtles is alive and well in the guitars of Sloan.

Hailing from Halifax, Nova Scotia, Sloan has dug into the ashes left behind from '60s pop and mixed it with some of the remnants of what The Smiths did in the '80s. These elements make up the band's second full length release Twice Removed (Smeared, also on DGC, was released in 1992), and take listeners on a journey that is still original, but where some of the stops along the way cause reminiscing.

Tracks like "I Hate My Generation," "Penpals," and "People Of The Sky" literally ooze with not only the guitar styles that conjure up images of quartets with matching suits, but also some unique vocal talents. Guitarists Jay Ferguson and Patrick Pentland and bassist Chris Murphy display harmonies that will have you doing a double take saying, "Is that the Beach Boys?"

Simple song construction and relatively brief songs, with the exception of "Before I Do" (seven minutes), make the first two-thirds of Twice Removed an album worthy of picking up. After that, the album falls into a rut of typical rock songs with forgettable licks that end the album on a down note.

It seems that British pop is still kicking, only this time in Canada. B (Mike MacLean)

LOVED Cranes
Dedicated/Arista

After being fortunate enough to score the coveted support slot on The Cure's last U.S. tour, the Cranes seek to consolidate their exposure.

COURTESY MICHAEL LAVINE

Cranes' latest is a dud.

Unfortunately, with Loved they've delivered the musical equivalent of a compost heap — various pieces of refuse with one thing in common: they stink.

See, the only talent the Cranes have is that of manipulating the market.

They're a corporate A&R man's dream recipe: take one ethereal young woman with "distinctive" voice, some good goth haircuts, sub-Cure basslines and pop in the MTV oven and watch it rise.

Cranes also try to appeal to the more exclusive goth audience: note the Degas cover art, "mysterious" band photos and completely unnecessary inscription of the lyrics to "Lilies," which basically says nothing then repeats to fade.

In an effort to reconcile the debate between quality and quantity, Loved has a generous selection of tracks. 14 in all.

Yet three of these are remixes of songs the Cranes think you should appreciate the most and frankly come over as pretentious and unnecessary. Even U2 producer Flood cannot save "Lilies," which wilts in a dirge of effects.

The album opens with "Shining Road," which twists along fairly plainly until vocalist Alison Shaw's voice kicks in. This to the uninitiated is a shock.

She sounds like a constipated Smurf; her voice is so piercingly squeaky that when played at low volume, half the dogs in your neighborhood will end up sitting on your doorstep.

The rest of the tracks on Loved are pretty much indistinct, alternating between soft squeaking and loud squeaking. The album's only decent song is the remix of "Shining Road," which buries Alison's hamster-whine in a racket of drums and guitar jangle. Cranes-Loved? Loathed more like it. F (Gareth Curtis)

WHY POPSTARS CAN'T DANCE
Various Artists
Slumberland Records

Trax On Trax Off

Although the word "compilation" has become synonymous with "suck," often there are one or two salvageable tracks amid the filler and B-side nonsense. Rarely do artists donate their better tracks to the compilation's cause, resulting in a dull and uninspired set of tunes that are forgotten soon after their release.

Not so with Slumberland Records' debut compilation, Why Popstars Can't Dance — and that is why it is such a joy. From start to finish the album holds up perfectly, acting less as a representation of the label itself and more of a showcase for aspiring new talent. Chances are you have not heard any of these bands except for perhaps the spaced-out, organ swirl of Stereolab. But never fear, the other 11 bands on the compilation provide some of the most interesting and diverse takes on the term "pop" heard this year.

From the twee-jangle of Rhode Island's HoneyBunch to the dreamy wall of noise created by The Ropers, Popstars provides a merciful release from the standard punk/grunge/metal that has saturated the market. And that just may be what makes the compilation so darn appealing. All of the artists featured sound so refreshingly honest and un-trendy that even the weaker tracks are pulled up by their boot straps.

"We are dedicated to bringing you quality bands and great songs," writes Slumberland founder Mike Schulman in the album's liner notes. If that is indeed the label's ultimate goal, then they have already more than succeeded. As for the answer to the label's question "why can't popstars dance?" — with music this good, who cares? A (Matt Audette)

New York City fave locale for television programs

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Big Apple remains TV's favorite setting for comedies and dramas, and currently serves as the narrative home for more than a dozen primetime series on the four major networks.

No wonder. Just as it does for its real-life citizenry, New York City offers fictional characters a handy, anything-goes latitude. Place them in NYC, at least nominally, and you've got behavioral carte blanche.

But while the series set here help themselves to the freedom that New York City confers, they don't always bother to be true to their setting, to get New York City right.

Of course, do any viewers care if New York doesn't enjoy an accurate portrayal? Doubtful. Nor should they . . . unless, possibly, they happen to live in New York — which I do — and sometimes chafe at the tenuous connection between the city they encounter on TV and the real-life version that lies beyond their triple-bolted front doors.

Both in looks and attitude, the cop dramas "Law & Order" and "NYPD Blue" do New York full justice. It doesn't hurt that both are fastidiously written series, or that "Law" is shot entirely on location and "NYPD" films its key exteriors here.

On the other hand, "The Cosby Mysteries" is NY-born-and-bred, yet, despite its handsome look, reflects a kind-and-gentle, through-rose-colored-glasses Gotham few residents have ever seen. (Just how out of touch can Bill Cosby be?)

I was thinking of TV and home one evening not long ago as I sat in a studio audience 3,000 miles from Manhattan's shores, for a filming of "Mad About You."

"Mad" kicks off NBC's Thursday block of New York sitcoms (the others, of course, being "Friends," "Seinfeld" and "Madman of the People").

At its best, "Mad About You" is smart and funny. And more: Not only is it by far the most New York-savvy of that Thursday foursome, it captures the flavor of the city perhaps better than any sitcom since "The Honeymooners."

I feel particularly qualified to judge "Mad's" verisimilitude, inasmuch as I live just 3 1/2 blocks from the apartment building in which the show's loving couple, Paul and Jamie Buchman, supposedly reside. That apartment house is located in Greenwich Village on the southeast corner where 12th Street crosses Fifth Avenue.

Another thing, if you'll pardon my overidentification with the show: Across 12th Street and sometimes barely visible in the show's exterior establishing shots, is my drug store (and, I can't help thinking, the Buchmans' as well.

Roberts loves 'Trouble;' a gentle 'Belle Epoque'

By Dolores Barclay

I Love Trouble (Buena Vista. Priced for rental market. Rated PG)

Funny how some movies just look better on a TV screen. I Love Trouble is an example. It's a small movie with little power, full of predictable plot turns. Perfect movie-of-the-week fare starring Julia Roberts and Nick Nolte.

It's an inoffensive, cute romantic comedy-adventure. Its heart is in the right place and it tries awfully hard, but miscasting and an incredible leap from reality prevent it from securing a place among such inspired past pairings as Irene Dunne and Cary Grant, Grant and Rosalind Russell, Katharine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy or Claudette Colbert and Clark Gable.

Nolte and Roberts are out of their league — especially Roberts, who is too much of a lightweight to engage in the type of spurty repartee and cerebral mindgames that Dunne and crew could handle in their sleep. The raspy Nolte does a lot better and probably could pull it off with, say, an Ellen Barkin or a Glenn Close.

Nolte and Roberts play reporters from competing Chicago newspapers. Peter Brackett (Nolte) is a successful columnist who's just published his first book. Sabrina Peterson (Roberts) is just beginning to cover serious breaking news stories after being on the style beat. They're both sent to cover a train wreck and, in the process, unravel a bombing, an assassination and a plot to put a carcinogen on the food market.

Their rival stories and constant attempts to out-scoop one another make the first half of the movie fast and fun. Then, the filmmakers take a tumble: The two rivals (Sabrina's now a big star) decide to pool their information and work on the story together, as they run all over the place stumbling over dead bodies and dodging killers with nary a word from any managing editor.

The danger element is dumb enough but, on the business side, reporters who sell out a story to a rival publication probably would be suspended without pay or fired on the spot. Sabrina and Peter fearlessly pry apart the conspiracy as they grow closer, natch. But do they really, really trust each other? Nah.

Belle Epoque (Columbia TriStar. Priced for rental market. Rated R)

Belle Epoque pushed over front-runner Farewell, My Concubine to snare the foreign picture Oscar at this year's Academy Awards. Belle Epoque is a lilting and gentle tale of love and sex in 1930s Spain before Franco rose to power. Director Fernando Trucba takes a lot of liberty with his beautifully photographed film, including some jabs at the Catholic Church.

Menton sets personal best times in 181-119 loss to Rutgers

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team fell on Saturday at the hands of a high-powered Rutgers team, by a 181-119 count. The defeat drops the Minutemen's record to 3-2 on the season, as they pause for a three week break.

Sophomore Greg Menton gave a strong performance for UMass, as he set personal best times on the season in both the 50-yard freestyle (21.58) and the 100-yard backstroke (52.46) events.

"He had an off meet the week before at the New Englands and his confidence was down," UMass Coach Russ Yarworth said. "And he came back and swam some of his best times ever, after a week of hard work. I think he just needs to continue making the transition from [water] polo to swimming."

Sophomore Chris Martin qualified for the ECACs with his time of 59.75 seconds, which won the 100-yard breaststroke. Freshman Scott Herbert finished an impressive third in the 200-yard breaststroke.

"That's great," Yarworth said. "That's nice because that starts to add to our depth. I can see them developing into college level swimmers."

The 200-yard medley relay team of Keith McLarty, Martin, John Kuntkoski and Kerry Huestion captured their race in a time of 1:37.37.

Senior Tim Milbert swam strongly as well, placing second in the 200 yard breaststroke, but it would not be enough to topple the Scarlet Knights this day.

"Rutgers is a very tough dual-meet team," Yarworth said. "They've got some really good top-line swimmers. Then they took their second line swimmers and they were trying to make cuts. That made it even harder for us because our strength is depth."

The Scarlet Knights' Larry Page broke a Rogers Pool record in the 1000-meter freestyle with a time of 9:37.70. Jeff Earschon also shattered another Rogers Pool record with 51.95 in the 100-yard backstroke, and a 1:51.74 in the 200-yard backstroke.

The Minutemen will take a three week hiatus from racing, returning to action Jan. 2. UMass will head to the warmer climate of Orlando, Fla., where they'll compete in the Orlando Invitational.

Over intersession the Minutemen will also return to Kingston, R.I., to compete in the Rhode Island Invitational. The last time UMass ventured to Kingston, they failed to capture their eighth straight New England Championship title.

With dual meets against Dartmouth, Connecticut and New Hampshire also on the horizon, there will not be much of a break this winter for the Minutemen.

their stand. The win started a six-game winning streak that included an NCAA tournament win over Harvard before losing to regional powerhouse Hartford in the second round.

Field hockey falls to Temple: The loss itself wasn't as significant but its chain reaction was. The game included one of the scariest moments of the semester as star goalie Hilary Rose was carried from the field on a stretcher with a neck injury. She turned out to be okay, but there was horror yet to come.

Despite only losing three times (two to top ten teams) and beating the top two seeds, the Minutewomen were unfairly excluded form the NCAA Tournament. The team had a chance to win it all but weak representation by the Northeast region's representative to the selection committee allowed Ohio State into the tourney while UMass stayed home. Absolute injustice.

Men's basketball beats Maryland: This win was big for many reasons. 1. Starting with the obvious, the Minutemen got a chance to avenge their tournament loss to the Terrapins and they did, beating the Terrapins in front of more than 13,000 hostile fans.

2. When the Terrapins beat the Minutemen last year, they did it on the strength of a second half comeback. Last Saturday it looked like Maryland might make another comeback but this time the Minutemen dug deep and held on.

3. They won without heroics from Lou Roe. In UMass' first two games against good teams, they relied on monster performances from the senior co-captain. This time the entire team stepped up and pulled away from the Terrapins even though Roe fouled out.

The confidence and character that this win could provide could prove to be valuable during the Minutemen's run toward the Final Four.

Reich to start for Bills on Sunday

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — The Buffalo Bills need to win their last two games to qualify for the playoffs. And they'll have to do it without quarterback Jim Kelly, who has a sprained knee. Such a predicament might be cause for concern — if they didn't have Frank Reich, considered by many the league's best backup quarterback.

A history of coming through whenever Kelly cannot has made Reich popular beyond his playing time, with his own TV show and a faction of fans that clamors for his promotion every time the starter struggles.

And the 32-point comeback he engineered in the 1992 playoffs against Houston — the biggest comeback in NFL history — has given Reich an aura of invincibility.

He discounts any talk of a "Reich Mystique," and so do his teammates. But they do profess complete confidence in his ability to deliver them from any bind.

"I don't believe in all that destiny stuff," special teams player Steve Tasker said. "But I believe in Frank. You always like to go with your frontline guy, which is Jim. But Frank's going to play well. And we're going to play well for him."

Reich also led one of the biggest comebacks in college football history, returning from a shoulder injury to rally Maryland from a 31-0 deficit to a 42-40 victory over Miami.

Reich is the first to admit that none of that will mean anything Sunday when the Bills (7-7) need to beat New England and Indianapolis the following week to make the playoffs.

"You don't want to rest on your experience. You have to go out and perform on the field every time," he said. "You don't want to think that just because you've done it before it's automatically going to happen again. Nothing's going to happen automatically for us."

Reich, who made $840,000 this season, becomes a free agent at the end of the year and he may get too pricey for the Bills to keep on the bench. The Carolina Panthers, an expansion team being assembled by former Bills general manager Bill Polian, already have expressed interest.

So, in addition to Buffalo's playoff hopes, Reich's own future is on the line.

"That's, like, so far in the back of my mind right now," he said. "Obviously, I'd be lying to you if I said that thought didn't go through my mind, and it has.

"But there's other motivating factors right now that are above free agency. . . . You want to do a good job with the abilities that God has given you. That's first and foremost. Secondly, there's a tremendous amount of pressure. You don't want to let a team or city or this area or the Bills fans down.

"The free agency and all that stuff. . . that's next year and there's other things right now that are more important to me." Bills coach Marv Levy showers Reich with compliments about his poise and the work habits that keep him focused even though he never knows if he will play. Instead of just focusing on a few plays in case of emergency, Levy said, Reich studies the entire game plan.

"I think he has the ability to step in and play well. And I think he's got a track record which proves it," Levy said. But he also thinks the other players play harder for him.

And Reich agrees.

"Certainly, when any big superstar player such as a Jim Kelly goes down, I think there's a sense of urgency on the team, that every play you've got to go out and make the big play, and every series is vitally important. And I hope that we can go in with that frame of mind," he said.

Fencing looks to build on past success

By Evan Whitney
Collegian Correspondent

Three years ago a noted sports columnist said, "If winning is a way to attract a following in sports, then this squad is on the verge of something big."

Not-many people on campus know that the University of Massachusetts has a fencing club, and even fewer know the intricacies of the sport, but that has not stopped the 40 students in the UMass Fencing Club from achieving success.

Over the past three years, the team has dominated New England competition, frequently beating varsity programs like Boston College and Brown even though UMass is only a club team. Through hard work and sacrifice, the team has accomplished much.

Last year was a banner of sorts for the team. The men were the champions of the Northeast Fencing Conference, compiling a record of 17-1. The women's team was equally as strong as they emerged as New England Club Champions and competed at the National Intercollegiate Women's Fencing Association Championships.

The team finished out the year by sending members of both squads to the USFA National Championships, where the men were crowned National Intercollegiate Club Champions.

"We have gone through a period of readjustment, setting our goals even higher," said Pete Lawson, club president and men's captain. "Through the support of the [Student Government Association], alumni and the athletic department, we have succeeded."

One of their goals was accomplished in November when the team traveled to Baltimore to face a number of top Mid-Atlantic teams such as Virginia and Johns Hopkins. So far this season, the men hold an 8-3 record while the women stand at 6-2. Including their present records, the teams have a combined record of 60-17 over the past three years.

"The fencing team represents the University in an excellent manner," said Frank Wright, director of intramurals and club sports. "Last year the team went to Utah for the U.S. Championships and placed well."

The team will continue its season in February when the team hosts the Men's Northeast Fencing Conference Championships on Feb. 11 and the Women's New England Championships on Feb. 19. Both competitions will be held in Totman Gym.

Despite of the club's success, the team must overcome many hurdles in its pursuit of excellence. The obscurity of the sport and its lack of mainstream visibility are two problems the team continues to tackle. Competing since the 1940s, the UMass fencing team has made its mark.

NHL season approaching doomsday

By Ken Rappoport
Associated Press

NEW YORK — NHL players will have to make a better offer to the league if they hope to salvage the season.

That's essentially what NHL commissioner Gary Bettman said in a news conference following Monday's emergency meeting of the board of governors.

"What the players have proposed has not addressed the problem," Bettman said.

As a result, the NHL could become the first sport to have an entire season wiped out.

"I told the owners at the start that if they went down this path they would have to be prepared to lose the season," Bettman said.

To that end, the board voted 26-0 Monday to give Bettman the authority to cancel the season if a new labor agreement can't be worked out with the union.

He would not give a "drop-dead date," however.

"It's impossible to set a firm date," Bettman said when asked when he thought a season would no longer be feasible. "We will re-evaluate day by day and consult with the schedule-makers."

The season is already officially down to 60 games following the cancellation of 24 games for each team. Realistically, it's probably closer to 50, given the time limitations between now and the end of June and the availability of arenas.

And 50 is the magic number, as far as the league is concerned. "It lends legitimacy," said Harry Sinden, general manager of the Boston Bruins' said of the 50-game season.

Monday's news conference only re-emphasized the owners' position of solidarity. It was similar to the Sept. 30 meeting in New York when the owners announced the season would be postponed for two weeks so the sides could try to work out a new collective bargaining agreement.

That Oct. 15 deadline passed with no agreement, further delaying the start of the season.

Both sides have remained rigid in their resolve since, despite a series of negotiations that brought them closer on some issues. "They've told us that they have given us all they had to give," Bettman said of the union position. "There's nothing left in their back pocket. That was even before we put the tax on the table."

The so-called luxury tax is the main stumbling block in the negotiations. The owners want to tax teams that spend more than the league average in salaries and distribute the money to small market teams who don't.

The players had made recent proposals in the areas of a rookie salary cap, free agency and arbitration, but stayed away from the contentious luxury tax issue.

Bettman said the players' latest offer was unanimously rejected at Monday's board meeting.

"This is not about a league fighting with a union, this is about a league fighting for its future," Bettman said.

Bettman said he sent a letter to union boss Bob Goodenow requesting the resumption of negotiations. The last time the sides met was in Chicago last Tuesday.

Goodenow, in a news release from the NHLPA, acknowledged receiving Bettman's fax.

"I have not spoken directly with the commissioner, but I will be in contact with him in the not-too-distant future regarding further negotiations," Goodenow said. "The commissioner has said he wants to take a problem-solving approach toward the stumbling blocks we have encountered."

Minutemen to take on Princeton tonight

Coach John Calipari's squad hopes to keep up offensive pace against Tigers

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Coach John Calipari has noted on many occasions that the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is at its best when it sets the tempo of the game, a style of quickness and intensity covering all 94 feet of the hardwood.

Tonight's game could very well move at the same rate as a snail's pace as the No. 5 Minutemen (3–1) take on Princeton tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center. The Tigers have been known in the past to slow teams down a bit with its halfcourt execution of holding the ball.

This year is no different as Coach Pete Carril's Tigers (3–3) are holding their opponents to an average of 53.2 points per game. The problem is they have only scored an average of 57 ppg themselves.

Princeton had better eat up the clock as much as they can because Massachusetts' offense has been strong in its first four games. Coupled with the fact that the Tigers have been outrebounded by an average of 8.0 rebounds per game (31.7 rpg) and the Minutemen have pulled down 7.5 more boards per game than their opposition (45.8 rpg), two teams on totally opposite ends of the spectrum will face each other tonight.

While Massachusetts has beaten the likes of Arkansas, Pittsburgh and Maryland, Princeton has defeated Lafayette, Lehigh and Eastern Illinois.

"Our first four games were tough ones. Now we've got a team that will race up and down — Princeton," Calipari joked to the media in the press room following the Maryland game.

But what concerns Calipari is not what Carril throws at them, but what his team does.

"I'm worried about us," Calipari said when asked about Princeton. "With each game, we're improving. We don't play any teams in a different way. We just cannot stop playing.

"This will be a key game for those guys who have stopped playing in the past few games. This will be a test to see if those guys really do want to play."

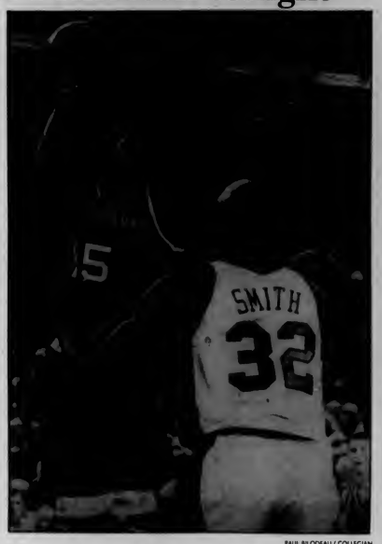
Last Saturday, most (if not all) of the Minutemen came to play in the 85–74 win over No. 11 Maryland in Baltimore. With Lou Roe, Derek Kellogg and Marcus Camby fouling out, and Edgar Padilla and Inus Norville in foul trouble, the depth of Massachusetts and the coaching ability of Calipari was evident after the tough 11–point road win.

Mike Williams received accolades for his effort against the Terrapins, knocking down three–pointers on his way to a team–high 18 points. Dana Dingle was another standout for Massachusetts in scoring 12 points, including a seven– consecutive point barrage late in the second half.

Inus Norville got into the action, coming off the bench in place of Roe and Camby in only his fourth career regular– season game, scoring six points and grabbing four boards in just 11 minutes.

The depth of the Minutemen has been the key ingredient in each of their first four efforts. When the mainstays are not playing well or are in foul trouble, the bench has risen to the occasion. When Roe scored 13 points in the Pittsburgh win, compared to the 67 points in his first two games, the offense spread out as five Minutemen scored in double–figures. The same type of depth was utilized against Maryland.

To put it in mild terms, Princeton just is not Arkansas, Kansas, even Pittsburgh or Maryland. And they are not in an elite conference such as the SEC, Big Eight, Big East or the ACC.



PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Senior co–captain Lou Roe seeks to help the Minutemen extend their winning streak to three games.

But this Ivy League team does have that patented game plan that, if used to perfection (and if is a gigantic word used in this case), can hold and frustrate its opponent. Just ask the 1989 Georgetown squad, who barely got by the Tigers in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, 50–49.

This season, Princeton has already faced an Atlantic 10 team in St. Joseph's, and fell 58–38 on Dec. 3. Its last game was at Illinois, and it ended in the same fashion as the St. Joe's game, 59–37.

This semester's 10 most significant games for UMass

The fall of 1994 was a semester of high and low points for the University of Massachusetts. On the upside the water polo team made the NCAAs for the second straight year, volleyball shined in only its second year since its reinstatement, men's basketball spent a week as the No. 1 team in the nation, and three teams won the regular season Atlantic 10 titles.

On the downside, field hockey was robbed by the NCAA tournament selection committee, and football finished sub .500.

In that up and down semester, 10 games (in no particular order) were the most significant:

Men's basketball blows out Arkansas: An announcement to the rest of the nation that Massachusetts basketball is for real. The win vaulted the Minutemen into the No. 1 spot for the first time in history. It also helped the draft position of Lou Roe, who dominated pre–season All–America Candidate Corliss Williamson.

Men's basketball upset by Kansas: Back to reality for the Minutemen. The game marked the end of Massachusetts' brief stint at No. 1. This loss was perhaps a blessing in disguise for UMass, as it alleviated the pressure and attention that goes with being the top–ranked team.

Volleyball beats George Washington: In only their second season, the Minutewomen made quite a splash by finishing third in the Atlantic 10. The game that served the most notice was their upset of perennial powerhouse George Washington, who eventually went to the NCAAs.

With no seniors on the squad, volleyball is on its way toward joining field hockey and women's soccer as Massachusetts powers in Atlantic 10 women's sports.

Hockey falls to Merrimack on consecutive nights: This weekend held ramifications for the Minutemen. It did show that they had come a long way from their talent level when they were decimated by Merrimack early last year.

However, many people had predicted these games to be UMass' best chances for their first win. They outplayed Merrimack, but were beaten by a better goalie. Frustration mounts as the losses increase.

Field hockey upsets No. 1, North Carolina in overtime: Perhaps one of the most exciting games of the year, this win was more than just upsetting the top–ranked team. After three ties that caused people to question the team, the victory renewed interest in the team. They proved it wasn't a fluke a week later when they upset No. 2 James Madison, the eventual national champions.

Men's soccer beats Rutgers: After a disappointing 1993, few people expected much from Sam Koch's squad yet these overachievers upset the powerhouse (and eventual Final Four participants) Rutgers en route to their first ever A–10 regular season title. With some talented young players, if they can avoid letdown, the Minutemen could soon become the class of the soon–to–be Rutgers–less A–10.

Football falls to UConn in finale: A sorry end to a sorry season. No passing, no fans and minimal spirit. UConn was a bad team, but UMass nailed it in and finished with a losing season. A lot of questions need to be addressed for this program if it has any real intentions of I–A.

Women's soccer pounds Vermont: The turning point.

In the midst of a midseason slump, it appeared that the Minutewomen, after making the Final Four in 1993, might not make the NCAAs this year. But on that Thursday afternoon, Coach Jim Rudy's squad made

Massachusetts hoping to cage Peahens

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Just two days after collecting their first win of the season, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will head to the court again tonight as they host the St. Peter's Peahens in the Curry Hicks Cage at 5 p.m.

The Minutewomen, 1–5, will be playing their first game at the Cage this season. Their home opener Monday night was in the William D. Mullins Center, where UMass downed the Providence Lady Friars, 64–52.

St. Peters comes into the matchup with a 3–2 record and five different players averaging over nine points per game. This will be the first–ever matchup between the two clubs.

"They are an athletic team," said Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien. "Size–wise, they are not real big but they have a couple people who are real good rebounders. They can really crash the boards and are very quick on their feet."

Mildred Washington, the leading rebounder for the Peahens, stands at 6 feet 2 inches tall, and the sophomore center manages to corral an average of 9.2 boards per game. Tonya Gertrude, a 5–foot–7–inch sophomore, is second on the team with 6.8 rebounds per game.

For the Minutewomen, rebounding becomes a key, especially from the frontcourt of Melissa Gurile, Crystal Carroll, Tez Kraft and Octavia Thomas.

Thomas has been the team's leading rebounder, including a 14–rebound performance Monday against Providence which tied a career high, and she will have to be a force under the glass again tonight for UMass to be successful.

Thomas' offensive performance (21 points) Monday was remarkable as well, as her point total moved her into ninth place on UMass' all–time scoring list.

"Octavia's job is to block out and chase the ball," O'Brien said. "As a team, we sometimes get into lapses where we don't rebound, and we can't let that happen."

On the offensive side of the ball, the Peahens are led by junior Tonia Collier. The diminutive guard stands at only 5 feet 2 inches tall but manages to score 16.8 points per game.

"She is a scoring machine," O'Brien said. "We will have to play tight defense on her, and not let her get any easy points."

Gertrude is also averaging double figures for the Peahens with 12.2 ppg, and three other starters — Washington and sophomores Mirja Sipila and Stephanie DeWolfe — have been offensive threats averaging over nine points per matchup.

For the Minutewomen, returning to the Curry Hicks Cage is something they look forward to. UMass was 6–3 in the Cage last season and will be playing their first of five matchups there this year.

EMILY WAY / COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen hope that point guard Sabriya Mitchell can build on her impressive performance against Providence tonight.

"The kids love to play there. It's a special place with a homey feel," O'Brien said.

The Minutewomen defense did extremely well against Providence, holding the Lady Friars to their fewest points all year, and will look to keep that streak going against the Peahens.

"We'll play our normal game," O'Brien said. "We'll play some zone and some man–to–man and try to keep them guessing."

Whatever the Minutewomen do, they will be playing this game without the added pressure of being a winless team.

"Pressure is self–induced," O'Brien said. "We got ourselves in a hole and we have to claw and scratch our way out of it."

O'Neill places fourth in pentathlon for Massachusetts

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

Junior Megan O'Neill narrowly missed a University of Massachusetts record, placing fourth in the pentathlon meet at the University of Rhode Island on Friday.

O'Neill and freshman Stacie Lavoie both competed in the pentathlon event, which lasted a grueling four and a half hours. The pentathlon consists of 55–meter hurdles, high jump, shot put, long jump, and 800–meter relay.

O'Neill finished with a score of 3,149 points, just missing the school record by seven points. The record was set in 1980 by Micki Callahan, who had a score of 3,156. O'Neill's score also qualified her for the New Englands.

"I know she will have the school record at New Englands by the end of the season," UMass Coach Julie LaFreniere said. "She will qualify for the ECACs. Megan is a veteran and is healthy. Last year, she competed with bad back problems which held her down."

Teammate Lavoie finished seventh overall with 2,636 points. For a freshman effort, pentathlon Coach Jim Gerroux was pleased with Lavoie's performance.

"We will try to qualify Stacie for New Englands at a later meet," Gerroux said. "She only needs 2,800 points to achieve this."

LaFreniere was also pleased with her performance.

"This is the first time for Stacie to compete at some of these events," LaFreniere said. "She is really a hurdler. The high jump and the shot put are new to her and she probably hates the 800–meter. But they both did a great job."

In the high jump, O'Neill cleared 5.3 feet while Lavoie cleared 4.10 ft. In the shot put, O'Neill threw 32.9 feet while Lavoie threw 24.8 ft. In the long jump, O'Neill leaped 16.5 ft. and Lavoie jumped 15.7 ft.

In the 55–meter hurdles, O'Neill finished with a time of 9.1 minutes, edging Lavoie, who ran it in 8.8 minutes. In the 800m, O'Neill qualified with a time of 2:25 min. Lavoie finished in 2:32 min.

For O'Neill, it was a first for her to be competing alongside a fellow teammate.

"It was a welcome change," O'Neill said. "We have a really great team this year. The freshmen are very strong."

O'Neill needed 51 points to qualify for ECACs. Other competitors qualified, along with nationally ranked University of Connecticut pentathlete Terri Roy who has run with Olympian Jackie Joyner–Kersee.

"It was a good meet," O'Neill said. "We had strong competition with Terri Roy, but we did well for an opener."

The rest of the Minutewomen will return for double–session workouts Jan. 8 in preparation for their next meet at the New England Challenge Cup Trials Jan. 13 at the University of Maine at Orono.

The top two teams from this four–way meet will qualify to go to the Finals at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire.

LaFreniere said she is confident.

"It's safe to say that we will go on to the Championship round with Dartmouth, Maine and New Hampshire won't be much of a threat," she said.

Antonio's closing early per request to control crowds

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Antonio's Pizza By The Slice, an uptown hang-out for students, has agreed to close its doors early next year to avoid the after bar rush.

According to Town Manager Barry Del Castilho, Antonio's will be closing at 1 a.m. effective Jan. 1. This was after Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia spoke to Bruno Matarazzo, owner of the pizzeria, about closing early.

"[Matarazzo] said he would close early if everyone did, then Bruno changed his mind and said he didn't want to close early," said Del Castilho. "He changed his mind again, and said he would."

Del Castilho said Matarazzo also asked the select board not to close other town businesses early because he had to close early.

"The select board is not going to close other businesses early," said Del Castilho. "We'll see if the problem's move to another location, then the board will consider more 1 a.m. closings."

Officer Charles Sherpa of the Amherst Police Department said it was difficult to control the crowds that flowed into the streets from in front of Antonio's.

"There was all kinds of disturbances we responded to at that location," said Sherpa. "People went into the streets and it became a safety issue."

Emmanuel Proust, a manager at Antonio's, said the trouble was the large crowds that formed after last call.

"There were too many people after 1 a.m., too much trouble," Proust said. "The police kind of told us to close, so we did."

Sherpa said he did not think the problem would just move to another location because Antonio's served as a meeting place for people out of town.

"You're not going to get these crowds," said Sherpa. "Establishments from other areas would close at 1 a.m., and the people would go to Antonio's to meet."

Proust said closing early will not hurt the business.

"People are going to have to learn to come earlier," Proust said.

Del Castilho agreed with Proust. "I think [Matarazzo] has a pretty good business around the clock."

W. Mass ensemble to perform free festive jazz concert in the CC

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the holiday season, University of Massachusetts students will be treated to the smooth sounds of jazz tonight in the Campus Center.

Entitled "Just An Illusion: An Evening of Jazz," the program is headlined by Montenia, a four piece ensemble. The event is sponsored by the UMass Office of Minority Graduate Student Recruitment (OMGSR).

Montenia, the eponymous vocalist for the group, which hails from Springfield, is backed by a trio of musicians of the Western Massachusetts jazz community: pianist Paul Arfanain, bassist Dave Arenium, and drummer Claire Arenium (the two Areniums are cousins).

Event coordinator and graduate intern Vanessa Harris said she believes the concert serves a dual purpose.

"[The concert] promotes diversity for the graduate students on campus," said Harris. "There's not a lot for us to do most of the time."

Senate honore local legislator for help in state appropriations

■ Student senate also rejects the proposed campus speech policy

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The last Undergraduate Student Senate meeting of the semester honored a Massachusetts senator and decline to endorse the proposed campus speaker's policy all in one night.

The student senate was joined by University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker and Chancellor David K. Scott to honor Chair of the Senate Ways and Means Committee Thomas Birmingham with an award for legislator of the year.

State Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) and State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) were also present for the ceremony.

President of the Student Government Association Mirran Raphaely made a brief speech before presenting Birmingham with the award.

"Birmingham helped get the $15 million for UMass which allowed for the tuition and fee freeze," Raphaely said. "It was the best way that he could support UMass and students that go here."

Birmingham supported the increase of $15 million in state allocations for the UMass system, of which the Amherst campus received $6.3 million. The increase in funding for the University helped freeze tuition and fees for the first time in nearly 20 years and resulted in a split refund for students in the 1994-95 school year.

"Sen. Birmingham showed his commitment to higher public education through actions instead of just through words," said Lynn Robitaille, student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy [SCERA] and student member of the Higher Education Coordinating Committee.

After receiving the award, Birmingham made a speech saying that receiving the award from students "meant a lot" and that the plaque would definitely be hung on his wall.

The senate also voted not to support the proposal for the Speaker's Policy from the Chancellor's Office. The senate passed a motion last night to not endorse the proposed Speaker's Policy and assert its primary responsibility over "services and activities which are designed primarily by students or those which are financed primarily by students."

"This is the administration's tool," Raphaely said. "We are not going to set parameters of who can speak and who can't through censorship or through University policy."

"If the policy is affirming freedom of speech through the First Amendment, what is the point, if there is law who needs policy," said undergraduate student speaker Mercedes Betanco.

"I though that Birmingham was very sincere in what he said," said Al Lizana, student trustee. "He is a very powerful person and I think he was really honored by receiving the award. It's nice to know that some of our representatives are human beings."

"The fact that Birmingham came out here considering his busy schedule is a further indication of his commitment to students and UMass," Robitaille said.

Robitaille, who worked for SCERA on the zero percent tuition and fee increase campaign last year, left the meeting after the award ceremony to attend last night's UMass men's basketball game. Robitaille was joined by Birmingham, Hooker, Scott, Story and Rosenberg.

Study of UM did not contact sources

Conclusions are tentative due to lack of data, author said

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials claim they had never heard of the organization which released a study criticizing the administration for mishandling conflict and multiculturalism on campus.

The Massachusetts Association of Scholars (MAS) released a report and analysis of the University without contacting many of the sources that they cited, according to Gary Brasor, MAS executive director.

"We hadn't had any contact, prior to this," said Danny Chun, from the University News Office. "Most of us had never even heard of this before the report came out."

The study, entitled Turmoil and Tension at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst: History, Analysis and Recommended Solutions, says that administration facilitated segregated programs and encouraged violent protestors.

References were made to many publications on campus and in the local area, and a few statewide publications.

Data was collected through various sources and documented. MAS drew conclusions and wrote an analysis of their findings and suggestions for the University, Brasor said.

"Some of the conclusions are said to be tentative, because of lack of data," Brasor said. "At the end, [the report] tells what data wasn't available."

The Minuteman, a conservative publication on campus, was one of the sources cited in the study. They had been contacted and informed of the report over the summer, according to Neil Krikorian, editor of the Minuteman.

"Although we support a lot of conclusions they came to, we are not directly associated with this study," Krikorian said.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, another source cited, was not contacted prior to the study's release.

MAS is an affiliate of a national organization concerned with the lack of structure and quality in higher education. The national organization, the National Association of Scholars (NAS), has 35 different state affiliates, according to Glenn Ricketts, NAS research director.

There are approximately six MAS members at UMass, and 150 total statewide, Brasor said.

"This is the first formal initiative of this kind," Brasor said. "This was about UMass — we're likely to do other schools in the future."

Courses aim to curb sexual harassment

■ New program will fall under the School of Education

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

Peer education is a common teaching device at the University of Massachusetts, and has recently aimed to address the issue of sexual harassment by and against students on campus.

Two courses comprise the Peer Education Program on sexual harassment, and both will be offered next semester through the School of Education.

The first course is a one-credit colloquium which will meet one night a week to introduces students to the topic of sexual harassment.

A three-credit seminar will follow the colloquium. Students who have taken the first course and are enrolled in the seminar also become peer educators who run "Courage and Coalition" workshops for other students.

"We are looking to curb the incidents of sexual harassment by students," said Michael Einhorn, a senior psychology major who is currently the student coordinator of the program.

Einhorn said the idea for the program originated last spring after he researched campus outlets and services pertaining to sexual harassment.

Statistics from Project Pulse, campus survey group, indicated that in 1992, 64 percent of UMass undergraduate women reported other students making explicit, unwanted sexual advances to them.

Project Pulse also reported 66 percent of undergraduate women said other students making unwanted physical contact with them, while only 34 percent of these women were able to label these behaviors as sexual harassment.

According to Einhorn, he discovered a shortage of University staff able to deal with students' needs. He also realized that a peer education program had never been created to address student/student sexual harassment, and "decided that it should begin."

Einhorn drew up a grant and distributed it to approximately 30 offices around campus. According to him, the most responsive recipient of the draft was Grant Ingle, director of the Office of Human Relations.

Ingle helped to organize the collaboration of other organizations, including Housing Services-Residence Life, Residential Academic Programs, University Health Services- Health Education, the Dean of Students Office, the School of Education-Social Justice, the Everywoman's Center and the Department of Psychology, Einhorn said.

These organizations make up the current Advisory Committee for the Peer Education Program on Sexual Harassment, which consists of faculty, staff, students and administrators.

Thus far the Office of Human Relations is the sole provider of some pilot funding which has enabled Einhorn to spread the word about the program, but will run out after this semester.

Through a 20-hour-a-week internship with the Office of Human Relations this semester, Einhorn has been able to continue to organize the Peer Education program and oversee the first offering of the one credit colloquia.

Unlike other models, the approach taken by the course is to answer questions without being critical, and does not present the notion of "limits" within men's behavior when interacting with women, according to Einhorn.

"We are teaching [the importance of] how the recipient feels about the behavior, not so much how it is intended," said Einhorn. "I think most men will understand that it's not that you can't flirt with women, It's just that you have to understand if it's unwanted, it's not flirting."

Nor does Einhorn want to promote the idea that all men sexually harass women.

"Some men do [harass] and some don't know they have the ability to stop it," said Einhorn. He said that criticizing the questions men ask about sexual harassment is not "going to achieve anything."

Because so far mostly women have enrolled in the courses, Einhorn said that he would like to see more men sign up. He especially encourages men who have experience with sexual harassment education to enroll.

"This is something that is going to need to carry on after this semester," said Einhorn. Although there is currently no funding for next semester, he said that he will continue to plan future courses, "and then hopefully the money will come later."

NY students held hostage, one injured

By Michael Hill
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — Five students at the State University of Albany were held hostage for nearly two hours yesterday overpowered a gunman who had taken over a college classroom — and one paid for his heroism with a gunshot wound.

Jason McEnaney, a student from Hicksville, N.Y., was shot during the struggle, and a single bullet ripped through his abdomen, groin and leg. He was listed in serious condition at Albany Medical Center Hospital.

"The students were heroes," university spokesman Joel Blumenthal said after the standoff. "There's no question that Jason McEnaney is a hero."

The gunman was identified as 26-year-old Ralph Tortorici, a psychology major. Tortorici smirked at television cameras as he was hustled into a waiting police car.

Tortorici, of Schenectady, N.Y., suffered lacerations to the right hand, and abrasions to the face and chest, and was listed in fair condition at the same hospital, officials said.

Tortorici took the hostages at about 9:30 a.m. after sneaking a rifle into a classics class at the campus lecture center. It was the final day of classes at the state school, where 17,000 students attend.

Thirty-five students were enrolled in the course on ancient Greece, which was meeting for the last time before the semester break, police said. Some students said they heard shots at the beginning of the standoff, but police were unable to confirm those reports.

Armed police were quickly able to evacuate surrounding classes and seal off the area.

"Somebody said: You better get out of here before it gets ugly," said student Pam Simons.

Authorities talked with Tortorici by telephone, and managed to arrange the release of Professor Hans Pohlsander and five students before the suspect was overpowered.

"He rambled a lot during the time he was there," Blumenthal said.

"He demanded a number of things . . . to speak to the president, to speak to the governor, everything," said Albany Police Chief John Dale.

Two of the hostages who were released early told a fellow student that Tortorici was not violent towards them.

"He was letting most of them smoke and study," said Scott Weinstein, a SUNY student from Brooklyn.

Albany Police Lt. Robert Wolfgang said McEnaney was able to speak to authorities as he was taken to the ambulance.

The other student hostages were giving statements to police and were being counseled, Blumenthal said.

"He's a nice guy, but I never knew him as someone who would throw himself in front of a gun," said Rachel McEnaney, an acquaintance of the victim.

At the McEnaney house in Hicksville, Jason's aunt was waiting for his mother to arrive home so she could deliver the news. "She's out Christmas shopping," said the aunt, who declined to give her name. "She doesn't even know about it."

Jason's father and his younger brother were on their way upstate after getting the news, while the aunt was at home with his other sibling, a younger sister.

Tortorici was led out of the lecture center about two hours after the situation unfolded, to the cheers of students who had gathered nearby. He shouted "Government experiments!" as he was escorted into the police car.

Blumenthal said Tortorici had mentioned something about financial aid during the standoff, but provided no motive for the crime. Blumenthal said he believed Tortorici brought the rifle into the class in a bag.

Classes were cancelled for the rest of the day, said SUNY officials.

HC science program recognized for creative approach

By James Zalesky
Collegian Correspondent

The introductory science courses at Hampshire College have recently been recognized as a "program that works" by Project Kaleidoscope for innovative approaches to teaching science.

All introductory science courses are taught by a hands-on- inquiry- based method that demands students to be involved in research and field work on projects of their own design, according to Ann McNeal, professor of physiology at Hampshire College.

McNeal said students in her class devise their own experiments by asking questions and then designing the experiments. One of her students is doing an experiment on the effects of horror movies on shoulder tension, she said.

"The method is so central of getting students involved, to ask their own questions and either get their own data or look at scientific literature," said McNeal.

At the end of a course students are expected to hand in a report that includes their hypothesis, explains the process and describes the results of their experiment. She said a few students have had their work published in scientific journals.

"It is a very challenging and exciting way to teach science," McNeal said. "The students have to put a lot into it and gain confidence in the ability to think for themselves."

The results of the experiments are not as important as students properly learn the processes of science, she said.

"One of my students said she 'felt dumb in science' now she is doing a paper on the effects of Ritalin on behavior," said McNeal.

McNeal said Hampshire College has employed this hands- on approach to teaching since the founding of the college in the 1970s.

"We all have worked on evolving the program," she said.

Project Kaleidoscope began in 1989 with a grant from National Science Foundation and is a division of the Independent College Office located in Washington, D.C.

Mary Gallagher, a writer and editor for Project Kaleidoscope said universities and colleges nominate their own science and mathematic programs.

Programs that are considered by Project Kaleidoscope have to be extraordinary or highlighted by innovations that are not generally applied.

"The purpose of Project Kaleidoscope is to bring innovative programs to the attention of the larger communities and other institutions," said Gallagher, "so they can serve as examples to be followed and so that others will not be 'reinventing the wheel.'"

McNeal said Project Kaleidoscope does a lot of outreach.

"They hold symposia and workshops designing labs, and help faculties and administrations communicate with each other."

McNeal said six to eight percent of the students enter Hampshire College with the intention of studying science, but 12 to 16 percent graduate with science degrees and 20 percent find jobs in the science field.

"As a faculty it is hard to keep up with all the science literature but we are always learning stuff from the students research," she said.

Hampshire College implemented a program with Brown University which will adapt an inquiry-based approach method for high school science and math classes. This project has been funded since 1993 with a $4 million National Science Foundation grant.

Of the estimated 6,000 graduate students attending the University, approximately 400 are minority students, a population OMSGR would like to see increase over the years to come.

OMSGR's mission is to raise the enrollment of minority and women students of color, specifically in the studies of business, engineering, the sciences and the applied social sciences; these fields have suffered from underrepresentation by minorities in the past at the University.

Harris said she hopes the concert will raise awareness of the low number of graduate students recruited and retained presently.

"The concert is a good way to get students involved," Harris said.

Admission to the concert, which runs from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m., is free.

Campus Perspectives

Do you think binge drinking is a problem on campus?

Compiled by Tim White • Photos by Daymion Smith

"Yeah, because alcohol is a very social activity. I don't know if [binge drinking] will ever be completely gone on campus, but educational programs should give students help about alcohol. Binging anything is bad — drinking in a social atmosphere with friends under control is OK."
— INING HSU
senior, environmental engineering
Hompden, Conn.

"Yes, I definitely think it's a problem. I think when people are in high school, parents are in control of them. When they arrive at UMass they have no parental guidance. I think it's [inevitable]; it's society. There are liquor stores everywhere. It's how we have fun, with a drink in our hand."
— JENNIFER MARX
senior, natural resources
Rochester, N.Y.

"Definitely. Out at parties people get so-hammered, they can't stand up. A lot of it is just the college atmosphere, especially with freshmen. People have to learn for themselves, there's not much others can do."
— JEANNE LOMBARDELLI
sophomore, communications
South Portland, Maine

"Yes. I'm a [resident assistant], I've seen it happen. People passing out and ambulances coming to pick people up. [Binge drinking happens] because it's there. Especially with freshmen and sophomores, there is so much pressure to have fun with alcohol and drinking."
— ANDREW FLEMING
senior, environmental engineering
Southington, Conn.

"Yes, I think it is because with any college student, there's a drinking craze, especially with freshmen. They think the drunker you are the cooler you are. They go to extremes to get drunker and drunker to fulfill the propheses of their older friends they met on campus."
— RHODA NUNEZ
sophomore, communications and Spanish
Revere

"I think it's a problem, look at the newspapers in the morning. What I've noticed is you see 17 and 18-year-old kids up here, and they don't mind what time they stumble home. Before they had to fool there parents and be home at a certain hour. I've come to smaller schools and they're strict about who you sign in, and what you bring in [to the dorms], that may curb the problem here."

Chechens vow battle to death against Russia

By Chris Bird
Associated Press

GROZNY, Russia — Russia stepped up its offensive in Chechnya yesterday, shelling the outskirts of the rebel region's capital and strafing the city from fighter jets.

Chechen forces downed a Russian helicopter and reportedly tore apart its two occupants.

The Kremlin warned the Chechens to lay down their arms by today or face "all consequences of their criminal recklessness." The exact timing of the deadline was unclear.

Chechnya's rebel president angrily withdrew his delegates from peace talks, which had achieved little progress since Monday, and urged the 1.2 million residents of his separatist republic to fight to the death.

Chechnya, located in the Caucasus Mountains 1,000 miles southeast of Moscow, declared independence in 1991, but Russia has refused to recognize the breakaway republic's claim.

"It's a war for life or death," President Dzhokhar Dudayev declared in a televised address. Condemning the advance of Russian troops, he said: "The soil must burn their feet."

Dudayev said it was "unacceptable to bomb populated areas while you have been conducting negotiations."

Separate reports said as many as 70 Russian soldiers and 50 Chechen civilians were killed in fighting the past three days. Those claims could not be independently verified.

Nearly all women and children have fled Grozny, capital of the oil-rich region. The city had 400,000 residents, most of them Muslims, before fighting broke out.

Streets were nearly empty yesterday except for pro-Dudayev fighters wearing green headbands and carrying rifles.

Last night, as Russian artillery pounded the outlying district of Staropromislovsky — inside Grozny city limits and about nine miles from the city center — Chechen men took to the streets with shotguns and hunting rifles.

"We'll fight to the last drop of our blood," 60-year-old Rusumbek Aliev vowed, pulling an ancient pistol from his sheepskin coat and waving it.

An estimated 10,000 to 40,000 Russian soldiers, supported by tanks, warplanes and helicopter gunships, moved into the region on Sunday, in an effort to oust what Moscow considers Dudayev's "criminal" regime.

A Russian government spokesman said yesterday that troops would seal off Grozny and disarm Chechen units.

"There will be no storming of Grozny," said Valery Grishin, an aide to Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin. "It's a densely populated Russian city."

Fears persist in the Duma, or parliament, that the Russians could get involved in a prolonged occupation of Chechnya similar to the Russian occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s.

Despite political infighting in Moscow, the offensive escalated yesterday around Grozny.

Five Russian SU-25 fighter planes made an air strike on the outskirts of Grozny and opened machine-gun fire elsewhere on the city, according to the ITAR Tass news agency.

For the second straight day, the Russians shelled the village of Pervomaiskoye, nine miles northwest of Grozny, reports said. Chechen officials said 20 villagers were killed and many wounded, and accused the Russians of aerial bombing raids. The Russians denied the accusation.

Explosions rang out from the snow-covered mountains beyond the city, and Chechen forces downed at least one Russian helicopter.

Anti-gay activities on the increase in United States, cites study

By Kim I. Mills
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Political and community leaders continued to crack down on homosexuals last year, seeking to remove gay positive books from schools and libraries and trying to pass legislation to deprive gays of civil rights, says a report by a liberal advocacy group.

"While most attention has focused on two statewide anti-gay ballot initiatives in Oregon and Idaho, a growing anti-gay campaign is gaining ground all across America," said Arthur J. Kropp, president of People for the American Way.

The organization's report, entitled Hostile Climate, documents 134 incidents of what it termed anti-gay activity in 37 states and the District of Columbia.

The group counted statewide anti-gay ballot initiatives, federal or state legislative battles; court decisions; local ordinances; education-related activity; censorship; and miscellaneous incidents related to public policy. They ranged from the introduction of 14 anti-gay bills in the Kentucky General Assembly to the cancellation of "Tootsie Day" — when boys dress as girls and vice versa — at a high school in Apopka, Fla.

In Boulder, Colo., several school principals canceled performances of a play about censorship, "Don't Read This." In Georgia and Oklahoma, the state legislatures took punitive actions against public broadcasting stations for showing "Tales of the City," a miniseries with gay characters.

And in at least two states, well funded lobbying efforts prevented passage of legislation recognizing same-sex domestic partners or offering protection for gays against hate crimes or discrimination.

Dumb happens.

Marcus Camby of the Game

Marcus Camby – 30 points, 5 rebounds, 3 blocked shots

Highlights...

It was a game where it was key to set the tempo. And while Princeton has the patented slow-down, eat-up-the-clock offense, it was Massachusetts who controlled the tempo, as evident by the 88-67 score.

Marcus Camby exploded for a season-high 30 points to go along with five rebounds and three blocks. All that for Camby in just 23 minutes of action. Lou Roe scored 17 points on 5-9 shooting from the field and a perfect 7-7 from the free throw line.

As a team, the Minutemen shot 54 percent from the field (32-56) and went 20-24 from the free throw line. Needless to say, behind Camby, Massachusetts was on target the entire game.

utes of the first half, culminated by a Chris Doyal (12 points) three-point basket to cut the Minutemen lead to eight with :55.

The second half, though, was a different story. Two straight Camby jumpers in the first minute of the second half set the Minutemen running, as they went on a 24-12 run to extend the lead to 20, 64-44.

The Massachusetts lead roamed around the teens, with its highest lead (21 points) coming at different points in the half, including the final score.

"That's an awfully fine team. My team played pretty well. We had been defending better. That's a hell of a rebounding team. If we played them again, the same thing would probably happen," Carril said.

no answer for either Massachusetts big man all night.

"We were just quicker than other big men," Camby said. "We were able to catch the ball, make a quick move and go to the basket."

The University of Massachusetts has reportedly severed ties with verbally committed recruit Mark Blount. The Greenfield Recorder reported yesterday that the 7-foot high school senior and the University had mutually agreed to end the commitment.

Camby, who also pulled down five boards and swatted away three shots, completely dominated the weaker competition during the time he was in, and received nothing but praise from Calipari.

"He was the man today," Calipari said. "Obviously, he had the size advantage."

Lou Roe added to the ambush with 17 points of his own (included 7-7 from the free throw line). Dana Dingle poured in 10 points and grabbed five rebounds. Mike Williams added eight points, and Donta Bright dished out a team-high six assists.

"The guys were unselfish," Calipari said. "When we're unselfish, we create shots. When we do that, we win most games. We had 22 assists on 30 baskets. That's big."

comfortable."

For the Peahens, sophomore center Mildred Washington (12) and sophomore guard Tonya Gertrude (11) were the only players to reach double figures in points.

"We couldn't do what we wanted to do," said Granelli. "They played very well, and dominated us on both ends of the court. They just played great defense."

"Your defense can carry you," O'Brien said. "And that's what they have done the last two games."

UMass holds the top spot in the team averaging well over 80 points per contest, to only 52 points Monday night.

Massachusetts, who began the season 0-5, has won two in a row, and are 2-0 at home (1-0 at both the Cage and the Mullins Center).

"It's good to have theses two wins," Gurile said. "It gives us a little bit of momentum."

The Minutewomen will be hard-pressed to keep that momentum going, as they will now have a 20-day layoff before they travel to Vermont to take on the Catamounts on Jan. 3.

"It will give us time to get things accomplished," O'Brien said. "We'll be able to add some things to our offense and defense."

Alger leaves Massachusetts hockey team

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

For a team that has struggled as much as the University of Massachusetts hockey team, the loss of a regular defensemen will only make things tougher.

Sophomore defenseman Rich Alger has left the team, with the intentions of transferring at the end of the semester. The Barnstable-native asked for and has been released from his scholarship.

"I think it is a big mistake for him. For us, we only want the guys who will work and want to be here, no player is bigger than this program," Coach Joe Mallen said.

Alger played in UMass' last game, a 6-3 loss on Friday night at New Hampshire. He has played in all of UMass' games this season and played in 27 of 29 games for the Minutemen last year.

"He's played a regular shift here, been given every opportunity to prove that he is a good player," Mallen said.

Alger had been somewhat of a poster-boy for the rebuilt UMass hockey program. He was Mallen's first signing, and was on the cover of Massachusetts Magazine's look at the re-born program before the start of last season.

"Our team is a bunch of first and second year guys who are in this process together, him leaving will not have that great an impact," Mallen said.

At the present time, it is unclear where Alger will transfer. Under National Collegiate Athletic Association rules, he will sit out next semester as well as the Fall of 1995 before gaining eligibility.

Sources close to the hockey team have stated that Boston University and Maine are among the schools he is considering.

"I don't think he realizes how much of an uphill climb [for playing time] he will face at another program," Mallen said.

The Collegian made attempts to contact Alger, but he could not be reached for comment.

The "W" may have fallen off the nameplate outside the William D. Mullins Center, but UMass hasn't found 10-11- 11 it yet. The Minutemen will host Princeton Friday night at the William D. Mullins Center in search of that first victory on the season.

That game will be the last of the semester for the Minutemen. The following is a preview of UMass' action over winterssession.

Notre Dame comes come to Mullins for a two game series on Dec. 30 (7 p.m.) and on New Years Eve (2 p.m.). Notre Dame is considered to be a bottom-of-the-pack CCHA team. Mallen's club will receive a boost during the series as BU transfer forward John Jacques becomes eligible on the 30th.

Jacques, however, fractured his leg several months ago in practice, but should be able to play around the time he becomes eligible. Sophomore defensemen Dale Hooper can return to the ice for the second ND game. He was ineligible due to academic reasons.

Bowdoin (Jan. 17) and Army (Jan. 24), two squads the Minutemen defeated last season, both come to Amherst, also as non-conference opponents.

UMass takes on several conference foes as well. Boston College is first on Jan. 6-7. The teams will square off for a home-and-home series, with the second game at the Mullins at 7 p.m.

On Jan. 15, New Hampshire comes in for a make-up of Saturday's contest which was postponed due to bad ice conditions at Mullins (time TBA).

Providence will be in Amherst on Jan. 22, the second of a two-game series. UMass will travel to PC on Jan. 21, a place where they suffered a 5-4 loss on Oct. 29. UMass had three leads throughout, including 4-3 in the third.

Hockey East leader Maine rounds out the wintersession schedule, coming to Mullins on January 27-28.

PAUL BLODGAU / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore defenseman Rick Alger (4) quit the University of Massachusetts men's hockey team and plans on transferring at the end of the semester.

Women's gym begins season over break

By Mike Pinder
Collegian Staff

This season, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team hopes to be vying for a NCAA championship spot, led by second-year head coach Dave Kuzara.

Kuzara served as the assistant coach at the University of Michigan for nonconsecutive three years (1990, 92 and 93). Kuzara is one of the main reasons why the Wolverines have become one of the top women's gymnastic programs in the nation.

Kuzara has brought his experience and expertise to UMass in hopes of leading the much-improved UMass women's gymnastics team into the national spotlight.

"We have a better shot this year than the team has had in the modern-day era of UMass gymnastic history," Kuzara said.

Last year, the Minutewomen registered a 17-6 record in route to a second-place finish at the Atlantic 10 championships. UMass was narrowly edged by three-tenths of a point to the eventual Atlantic 10 champion West Virginia.

Along with assistant coach Rene Lyst, Kuzara has implemented a new attitude for the Minutewomen — that of the team.

"We've instituted a whole new system this year," Kuzara said. "It's more than one person, you have to have five good people out there."

The biggest obstacle the Minutewomen had to overcome last year was becoming accustomed to the demands and the new coaching methods of Kuzara and Lyst.

According to Kuzara, the Minutewomen had difficulties adjusting to the changes, but insists that this year the team is ready to make a run at the Atlantic 10 title and earn a bid to the NCAA championships.

"Preseason was the first time we tried to get them to train a different way," Kuzara said. "Once we got into the meet season, they weren't used to the way we ran things either."

"We are much more disciplined and consistent this year," Kuzara said. "Everyone knows what to expect now. Our goal is to win the A-10 and make it to the nationals."

With a new winning attitude and a quickly rising status to respectability, UMass faces their most grueling schedule in the history of the program.

UMass squares off against three-time defending Atlantic 10 champion West Virginia in back-to-back meets in February. The Minutewomen will also clash against teams such as Georgia, UCLA, Michigan and Penn State — just to name a few.

"We have a big time schedule this year," Kuzara said. "Georgia will probably be ranked number one in the country when we go there. UCLA will probably be three or four, and Penn State will probably be ranked fifth. When we travel to Michigan, they will also be ranked in the top three."

UMass is a young team featuring five juniors — Shaheda Keels, I.J. Tolhurst [a transfer from George Washington University], Leann Zavotka, Ruth Reeves and Lisa Coyne; two sophomores — Tara Swartz and Lianne Laing; and two freshmen — Karen Maurer and Penny Lebeau.

The only seniors on the team are co-captains Erica Baum and Stephanie Martino.

"I expect that they will provide a great deal of leadership for us," Kuzara said of his two senior co-captains.

The top returners for the Minutewomen are Laing, Keels and Swartz.

Keels is the team leader on the floor exercise. She placed second on the floor exercise [9.775] at the NCAA Northeast Regionals and placed fifth on the floor [9.80] at the National Invitational Women's Gymnastics Championships.

Laing is one of UMass' top all-arounders. She tied the UMass vault record with a 9.90 at the 1994 Atlantic 10 Championships.

Swartz is another all-arounder for UMass. She also tied the vault record with a 9.90 at the A-10 Championships.

need-based athletic scholarships, which has restricted recruiting abilities. Moving to the A-10 will allow Ram coaches more recruitment opportunities. The Rev. Joseph O'Hare, Fordham president, was pleased at the opportunity for his school.

"This is in the best interest of Fordham," O'Hare said. "We want to recruit a student body more national in scope.

"We will be able to compete with more freedom for our coaches, recruiting with full athletic scholarships. We're excited about the prospect of competing in what has become one of the premier athletic conferences."

Atlantic 10 Commissioner Linda Bruno was pleased with the conference's newest addition.

"We are honored to welcome Fordham," Bruno said. "They will make significant contributions in all our sports. This is a happy day in our 19-year history."

Fordham is particularly attractive to the conference because of its location in New York City. With the defection of Rutgers to the Big East, Fordham allows the conference to retain a foothold in the New York/New Jersey area. Bruno was adamant that the conference was pleased to have Fordham, regardless of location.

"We are excited to have such a prestigious institution in the media capital of the country," Bruno said. "Their location certainly attracted them to us, but we were motivated by who they are not where they are."

Massachusetts Athletic Director Bob Marcum said the entrance into the New York market is a plus for the conference.

"This is positive because it puts [the A-10] in the New York market. This will give us some opportunities to play some games in Madison Square Garden," Marcum said.

There have been rumors circulating about other potential additions, most DePaul and Dayton.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A great day to promote a pet project or special cause. Map out a campaign, then call on your friends and colleagues for help. Handle business negotiations with finesse.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Pay special attention to any job and health suggestions you receive now. Afternoon is the best time to discuss business matters. Stop talking about the way a loved one disappointed you, show your forgiving nature.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your mood improves as the morning trips by. If you seize an opportunity to make or save money, move swiftly. Be assertive but not bossy in your personal relationships.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do not allow your sympathy for someone to blind you to their faults. Take care of your chores on the regular way. A leisure pace is unnecessary. Spend the evening with cheerful, upbeat friends.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Not a good time to make major decisions or assume new responsibilities. Stop talking about the generous to loved ones without going into debt. A kind act can mean more than any lavish gift.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Move within a familiar orbit today, avoiding all types of extreme behavior. Dismiss petitions arise when someone feels neglected or threatened. Show consideration.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Early-morning distractions could make driving hazardous. Keep your eyes on the road. Later, watch for business pointers you can use to promote a new deal. Focusing on your immediate goals will hasten progress.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Listen respectfully to a supervisor's suggestions for improving your job performance. It is important to ask well-beaten questions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Take another look at a project you recently abandoned. You may be able to restructure it so your advantage shows for stunning rhythm during the lunch hour.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Others continue to show their true colors. Be flattered by their delight. Take the lead in relationships. Try to get together with someone whose interest. Be sure to call people you will not see again soon.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Ignore idle gossip and keep a close eye on spending. A pet project should be put on the back burner temporarily. Seek an influential person's advice if confused about the right direction to take.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): There is no reason for personal grudges in the office. Go out of your way to cooperate with difficult people. An opportunity to express your artistic side will boost your self-esteem.

Rich Alger to leave UMass hockey team next semester

Sophomore defenseman Rich Alger announced his intentions of transferring at the end of the semester, and asked for a release of his scholarship (See story, page 6).

Minutewomen to have busy break

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will play nine games on the winter session. Play in the Atlantic 10 will begin on Jan. 5 against Temple (See story, page 5).

Camby `the man' in UMass victory

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

"It's even hard to ask questions about a game like this, isn't it?" University of Massachusetts men's basketball coach John Calipari said at the press conference last night after the No. 5 Minutemen soundly defeated Princeton 88–67.

There were not too many things that stood out. There was Massachusetts center Marcus Camby, a man amongst boys in punishing the Tigers for 30 points in just 23 minutes of playing time.

The Minutemen (4–1) did extend their home unbeaten winning streak to 35, which includes 20 straight at the William D. Mullins Center (the first 15 are carried over from home games at the Curry Hicks Cage).

Massachusetts	88
Princeton	67

And Princeton coach Pete Carril, as colorful as ever, was thrown out of the game for hitting the officials in drawing two technical fouls.

After screaming at the refereeing corps, Carril began shouting cross–court at Mickey Crowley, supervisor of Men's Basketball Officials, saying, "I told you, Mickey, that guy's no good!"

Carril was his usual straightforward self about his criticism of one of the referees.

"To tell you the truth, I don't like the sonavabitch. I don't think he's a good ref. My guy got hacked, and he didn't call anything," Carril said.

Other than Carril's antics and a number of Camby jams, the game played in front of a sold–out Mullins Center crowd (9,493), was a combative effort between the slow–down, Tiger offense and the quick, relentless Minuteman attack. As evident by the high score (especially for a game that involves Princeton), Massachusetts set the tempo of the game.

"I was pretty pleased with our effort," Calipari said. "It's a hard game to coach against a team that plays like they do."

"[Massachusetts] played it smart, they got us to be less patient. The tempo was to their liking," Carril said. "You don't expect Princeton to beat the No. 5 in the nation, do you?"

If there were any thoughts about a huge upset, they may have entered the mind in the first half, where Massachusetts only led the Ivy League team by eight, 40–32.

The Tigers played the Minutemen tight in the beginning, only down three, 11–8 with 13:32 left in the first half. They stayed patient, and found the scores coming from backdoor screens and resulting in uncontested layups.

Once Massachusetts stopped the backdoor plays, Princeton had to rely on its outside shooting. They ended up burying four three–pointers in the last eight–plus min-

Unstoppable.

Against the Princeton Tigers last night, Camby was unstoppable. Coach Pete Carril's squad, usually known for its defense, had nothing that could stop the 6–foot–11–inch sophomore center in Massachusetts 88–67 win.

In 23 minutes of action, Camby scored at will, netting a season high 30 points, only two shy of his career best of 32. If the game had been closer, he might have scored 40, but with the game comfortably out of reach, Massachusetts Coach John Calipari emptied the bench, as the All–America candidate left the game to a standing ovation.

"Marcus Camby was the man today," Calipari said. "He obviously had a big size advantage. He understood it and he used it. He went at it.

Camby had an impressive first half, scoring 12 early points, working inside and outside mixing dunks with 15– foot jumpers as the Minutemen led by eight at the intermission.

In the second half, Calipari made the decision to give forward Lou Roe, who was ailing from the flu a rest, and center the offense around his sophomore.

"We just said we're going to sit down Lou, play Dana and Rigo, and go to Marcus for a while."

It did not take long for him to deliver. Camby scored the Minutemen's first four points knocking down two jump shots.

While the Minutemen were trying to bring the offense to Camby, Princeton was trying to keep its shots away from him. After a slow start this season blocking shots, Camby has returned to form swatting three against the Tigers.

"It's pretty much just timing," Camby said. "At the beginning of the season I was trying to block everything, and got in foul trouble. [Tonight] I was waiting for him to release then jump."

In a game that was otherwise a yawner, as Princeton's snail pace offense slowed the pace of the game, Camby kept the crowd into the game by putting on a dunking exhibition midway through the second half.

Aided by some nifty passing from senior guard Mike Williams, Camby brought the crowd to its feet with an alley–oop.

Three minutes later, Camby extended the Massachusetts lead to 16 with a reverse dunk followed by a double–clutch lay up to put the home team ahead 62–44.

"The team thought [Princeton] couldn't stop me down low, so they tried to give me the ball as much as possible."

Calipari was not surprised by Camby's performance.

"I've seen Marcus do this," Calipari said. "I don't want Marcus to feel pressure. What we're saying to him is: whatever you give us Marcus is great. Just block shots play defense and make a difference in the game. I keep telling him don't put pressure on yourself.

"When Marcus Camby puts pressure on himself, he's not this kind of player. Against Kansas, he felt I have to do this."

Calipari expects Camby to get even better.

"He's the best listener I've ever coached; that's why he's going to be good," Calipari said. "I keep telling him don't put pressure on yourself."

Easily overlooked in the shadow of Camby's 30 points was Roe. Despite being ill, Roe quietly scored 17 points. The Tigers had

Backcourt duos spark team play

Allen and Maloney, Vaughn and Haase, Stoudamire and Geary, Orr and Lenard.

Alone they are special players, but together they are deadly — the best backcourts in America. Pennsylvania's Jerome Allen and Matt Maloney work extremely well in Coach Fran Dunphy's system of moving the ball and firing from downtown. In order to play in UPenn's system, the guards need to handle the ball.

Art Stapleton Jr.
On College Basketball

Allen can play in and will dazzle the NBA; Maloney's the epitome of a coach's son. The two as a tandem are one of the best.

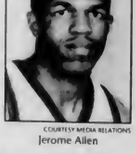
Kansas' Jacque Vaughn and Jerod Haase in only two months have jelled together under Coach Roy Williams to form the nation's most potent backcourt. Vaughn is your typical push–the–ball, lightning–quick point guard who is probably just as smart on the court and he is off of it.

The sophomore was absolutely perfect in his freshman season with the Jayhawks, achieving a 4.0 Grade Point Average. Vaughn has earned even better grades, if possible, to start this season.

With the transfer of Haase to Lawrence, Kan., from Todd Bozeman's California squad, Williams suddenly has a formidable replacement for last year's starting two–guard Steve Woodberry, a Mr. Do–Everything for the Jayhawks.

Haase is used to playing alongside greatness — Jason Kidd was his backcourt mate at Cal before he transferred. Ask Massachusetts and Florida how good Haase really is.

With the departure of NBA prospect Khalid Reeves, it may have been a lot to ask for Arizona to reload its backcourt in just eight months. However, gunner Damon Stoudamire is now joined by junior jumping jack Reggie Geary, making up one of the nation's most formidable backcourts.



COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jerome Allen

Stoudamire will play at the next level, even if it takes him another season to find out whether his true position is the one or the two. Geary is still developing, and by the end of the season, could blossom into a superstar.

Minnesota's Townsend Orr and Voshon Lenard have been at the forefront of the Golden Gophers' ascension from mediocrity in the Big Ten. Both players can score from anywhere on the court and want the ball when the game is on the line. Lenard is a pure scorer, while Orr needs to have his shots from three–point line fall to pour on the points.

Peahens are no problem for Minutewomen

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Sometimes they come easy.

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team had no problems dealing with the St. Peter's Peahens last night at the Curry Hicks Cage, as the Minutewomen cruised to their second win of the season 63–40.

Massachusetts	63
St. Peters	40

Junior center Melissa Gurile paced UMass (2–5) with 21 points, including 15 in the second half, while Octavia Thomas poured in 12 and grabbed a game–high eight rebounds.

"Our post players did a great job, and we were able to get some of those high–low passes we like," said Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien, whose guards lobbed high passes inside to the forwards all night.

"The high–low passes really killed us," St. Peter's Coach Mike Granelli said. "We knew what they would do and they just did it. We couldn't stop it."

UMass trailed only once in the contest, and that was 5–4 just over three minutes into the game. From there, the Minutewomen went on an 18–point run, including seven from sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski, to turn a 7–7 tie into a 25–7 cushion.

"I knew the key was to get them early, and we were able to do that," O'Brien said.

The Minutewomen's defense came up big in the first half, as they held the Peahens, now 3–3, to only 11 points in the first period, en route to a 31–11 halftime lead.

"Our defense didn't allow them to score, and they started to doubt themselves," O'Brien said. "They wound up playing at our pace instead of playing at their pace."

"We absolutely had to win tonight," Gurile said. "That was the difference. We went out with that attitude."

Possibly the greatest testament to the UMass defense was the fact that Peahen leading scorer Tonia Collier, a 5–foot 2– inch guard who was averaging 16.8 points per game coming in, scored only seven points in 31 minutes.

"Anytime you have a leading scorer, you want to shut her down, and we were able to do that," O'Brien said.

"We just tried to step up and help out on her," said Gurile. "Our guards did a great job on her."

It was simply more of the same in the second half, as UMass did not miss a beat. The Minutewomen came out of the break and went on a 10–2 run, led by eight points from Gurile, to grab their biggest lead of the game at 43–13 and squelch any hopes of a Peahen comeback.

"Mel needs to work the boards and play solid defense," O'Brien said. "She did a very good job on offense tonight."

Sophomore point guard Sabriya Mitchell played her second straight steady game, dishing out seven assists, several in exciting fashion, while also collecting five rebounds, second only to Thomas.

"Sabriya was solid," O'Brien said. "She can't worry about stats, if we win that's the statistic that matters. You have to remember she sat out a whole year, she is just starting to feel

College football expert looks at bowls

As the close of the semester draws near, some college football teams around the nation have the chance to make or break their seasons. For some coaches and teams, it's already a lost cause. For others, the season has already been a remarkable success.

Without any further delay, it's time to get on to the predicting of the post–season bowl games, paying attention to the most important match–ups. Much like last season, the regular season record (17–14) was stuck in mediocrity. However, my bowl predictions last year were uncanny (7–0), let's hope that continues.

Anthony Guido
On College Football

Aloha Bowl (Dec. 25): Kansas State 34, Boston College 17. Yet another reason why the bowl coalition fails miserably. K–State goes 9–2, but must play in the first bowl game, on Christmas, and must make the expensive flight to Hawaii.

Other teams have more losses, but have been given better bids. This game isn't very attractive— a ratings nightmare on the holiday. What this game is, is a showcase for KSU quarterback Chad May. May can elevate himself to the top half of the first round of the upcoming NFL draft by torching the BC defense, a task that shouldn't be too hard.

Freedom (Dec. 29): Arizona 16, Utah 10. The disappointing 'Cats against the faceless Utes. Faithful reader KD (the only known Oregon State fan this side of Montana) pleads for the pathetic Pac–10, but it does no good. Arizona, a pre–season national title contender, should be embarrassed to be in this game.

If Ted Bruschi and the Arizona defense have any heart left, they should plow over Utah. As the story has gone all season, the Wildcats cannot blow opponents out due to the erratic QB play of Dan White.

Holiday (Dec. 30): Michigan 28, Colorado State 16. Another contest with one team just happy to be there. That won't be enough for the Rams as Tyrone Wheatley will exit with a bang. Gary Moeller (you even lost to Ohio St.) should be feeling more heat than he is.

Coach Moeller shouldn't even return to Ann Arbor if they lose this one. This had better be the last time that the Wolverines lose more than twice in a season, or Moeller will join the ranks of the unemployed.

Gator (Jan. 1): Virginia Tech 24, Tennessee 20. The Hokies are another squad that had high aspirations, but three losses later will square off with a young Volunteer team. This will an unheralded game, but the athleticism of the two teams will make it exciting. Tech's experience wins out, but no one will notice with the Orange on tap.

Fordham becomes A–10 member

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 announced that Fordham University will become the newest member of the conference starting next fall.

The Rams will compete in 16 of the 18 sports in the A–10, including men's and women's basketball, soccer, baseball and softball.

Fordham joins Xavier University as the second school to join the Atlantic 10 for the 1995–96 season. Both schools will officially join the conference July 1, 1995. The addition of the two institutions will allow the Atlantic 10 to remain as a nine–team conference, because two current members, Rutgers and West Virginia, are leaving the A–10 for the Big East following this year.

Fordham has been competing in the Patriot League since 1988 and will continue to compete in the league in football. The Patriot League allows only

WHAT'S INSIDE

With the end of 1994 comes finals, the holiday season and the second annual Collegian Arts & Living Year in Review. We begin our coverage below with an in-depth look at what happened this year in movies, concerts, television and trends. Also, the Collegian unveils its picks for the three Artists of the Year.

On page three, Tara MK Connelly examines the year in pop culture with a month-by-month timeline as well as this year's picks in fashion — from the runways of Paris and back again. On page four, Jon Lupo reveals his picks for the 10 best films of the year, along with five choices for '94s most and least impressive performances.

Tracy Gavel gives her opinion on the 10 best and five worst television programs of the past year on page five. Our crack music staff has also chosen their top and bottom choices for albums, singles and more on page six.

We round out our look at 1994 with a retrospective on page seven of those entertainers who passed away and the legacy they leave behind. Also, Matt Audette eulogizes the troubled, short life of Nirvana's Kurt Cobain.

YEAR IN REVIEW 19 94

'Lion King' roared, 'Gump' happened and Cruise sucked

By Ed Humphries
Special to the Collegian

Ohh, if Juicy Fruits could only talk. Wedged deep within the lush confines of aisle seats, the lime greens and ruby reds adorning duro-plasic cupholders, molded for "her" pleasure, slip-sliding their way through rivers of genuine imitation "That Ain't Butter." They've seen it all. The comedy, the drama, the horror of Popcorn Cinema '94.

Film

Each year it's the same story: "The Feel Good Film of the Year." "The best female buddy pic since...;" "Two marginally diverse-enthusiastic thumbs up, way up!"

The blurbs fall where they may, the top 10 lists fade but it's the films that live on past that last dust-filled flicker of electric lights. 1994 was a box of chocolates, and well, you know the rest.

Traditionally, January and February are the last way stations before "your shows of shows," the Academy Awards, spangles brightly. 1994 held by that rule with Disney's so called "adult" branches dumping films like Blank Check, The Mighty Ducks II, Angie and the family sex farce My Father The Hero upon an unsuspecting populace.

With such pop-culture pollution pervading the barren hinterlands of January cinema, it's no surprise that Jim Carey could

Nude cops, white Broncos make for wild TV season

By Tracy Gavel
Collegian Staff

Well folks, it's been quite a year. We TV addicts have been faced with everything from nude cops and silly made-for-TV star biographies, to superstar Madonna spouting expletives on CBS' "Late Show" and an obviously shaken Michael Jackson describing the horrors of a body cavity search. One thing's for certain — the last 12 months haven't been boring.

Television

Sure, there were some pretty mediocre moments — seeing Gene Wilder in his shorts on NBC's "Something Wilder" was an all-time low. And some network contributions to the new fall schedule were somewhat lackluster — particularly the many "Seinfeld" retreads that have been crowding the airwaves. Still, I noticed that the quick wit and intelligent performances of such dramas as NBC's "Homicide" and sitcoms like Fox's "The Simpsons" haven't gone out of favor — not by a long shot.

So it really wouldn't be fair for me to say (as some media critics have) that 1994 has just been one big waste of time, because there are a number of watchable shows out there. I mean, let's be honest — there aren't but a few really good shows to be found during any season. And if you actually took the time to click around in 1994, it should have been obvious that the quality of programming ran the full gamut — from outstanding to just plain awful.

I think as far as trends go, "realistic" would probably be the best word to describe a lot of television's outstanding content during the past year. Whether we're talking about "The Ricki Lake Show," "Law and Order," or "Roseanne," nearly all of this year's important pro-

Mosh pits to dance floors: The Valley comes alive

By Michael Burke

1994 was quite a year for interesting music in the Valley. Throughout the year, established acts played in front of packed audiences, while newer bands struggled to find fans.

Artists of all genres including rap, funk, folk, punk, and rock have showcased their talents to eager college students. Even the most fickle of music fans could not find at least one show to enjoy over the past year. Here's a look back at some of the shows that left lasting impressions on those who saw them.

• No, George Clinton is not Bill Clinton's brother, although it would have been interesting to see the president jam with this band. With the help of the P-Funk All Stars, the aging father of funk blasted through songs from all phases of his illustrious and lauded career. While the show was an astounding four hours long, Clinton kept the crowd grooving until the house lights finally came up.

• Two rap bands that continue to follow their roots are De La Soul and Tribe Called Quest, who both brought their acts to the Student Union Ballroom in March. Although the show was a tad on the brief side, both bands proved that rap can and is supposed to be performed live.

Sanity, scrunchies & retro: what made 1994 so unique

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

The end of the year always seems to spawn a list of things that have become popular and things that have faded into the dark realm known as uncoolness. This year, it's my task to provide a list of these In's and Out's. So without further digression . . .

Tre

IN: Science Fiction
OUT: Cop Shows

Networks are scrambling to catch the audience left behind by the loss of "Star Trek: The Next Generation" by infusing the airwaves with Sci-Fi galore. "The X-Files," "Earth 2," and "SeaQuest" are at the head of the pack and a new Sci-Fi network has been started to house older shows like the original "Star Trek" and "The Twilight Zone."

Nothing interesting has been done in cop shows in a long time, most are just annoying twists on old plots. "Homicide" is so horribly trivial that it becomes frustrating just to think about watching it and the only thing new thing about "NYPD Blue" are the naked butts...yawn.

IN: "Melrose Place"
OUT: "Models Inc."

I don't know if it can really ever be out because it was never in, but regardless, it's pretty bad.

IN: Figure Skating
OUT: All other winter Olympic sports

Skating was certainly helped by the Tonya and Nancy fiasco. Even now that it's over, more than just a couple of new fans have no doubt been reeled in.

With her intelligent, whip-smart lyrics and her neo-feminist attitude, Liz Phair proved to be one of 1994's most compelling and fascinating artists.

ARTISTS of the YEAR

Liz Phair

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Call her brash, call her a feminist, but one thing is crystal clear after 1994 — Liz Phair is a songwriter whose music has an in-your-face attitude. And she's at the head of the pack of women who are resurging into rock music in the 90s.

Phair started out in Chicago with a tape of demos which were recorded in her bedroom and released under the moniker Girly Sound. Her talents received an unexpected response from those lucky enough to get a copy and soon caught the attention of Matador Records. This New York-based indie label gave Phair the resources to record her highly acclaimed debut album Exile In Guyville in 1992.

The hype over Guyville grew to the point where it was the closest thing to a frenzy as an independent release can receive. With eyes beginning to focus on her, Phair started talking about how the album was related to the classic Rolling Stones album Exile On Main Street. Her song-by-song response to the Stone's swaggering male bravado drew an enormous response from feminists and indie music junkies alike and sent the hype right through the roof.

These elements, when combined with her rare live appearances due to chronic stage fright and

Quentin Tarantino

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

If Quentin Tarantino's rapid Cinderella ascension to fame seemed to happen amazingly quickly, don't be surprised. If ever there was a time for the autour du jour to take the world by storm it was 1994.

In an age where the distinction between pop culture trash and high art is often a blurry one, it is only appropriate that the 31-year old self-taught director's high octane, thrill-fests would seemingly become the rage.

With slacker credentials (his previous job was working at a video store), a penchant for stylistic violence and a dizzying knowledge of film, Tarantino's track record practically exudes coolness — his films are the proof. A film buff at heart, Tarantino is just as likely to dip into the realm of his favorite B-movie guilty pleasures as he is to satisfy his high brow, art-flick urges.

The buzz started after Tarantino's 1992 blood-pumping debut Reservoir Dogs, but it wasn't until he walked away with the Palm d'Or at Cannes for his follow-up Pulp Fiction that the volume was turned up full blast.

Taking all the bang that Reservoir Dogs delivered and then blowing the whole thing sky high, Pulp Fiction proved to be the art film that the

After being canonized by a TV Guide "cheer" for his inventive use of "Happy Days" footage in his video for Weezer's "Buddy Holly," it's clear that Spike Jonze, the 25-year-old buzz bin auteur, has become mainstream. Which, depending on your strict allegiance to the mystical term of "indie," is a good or a bad thing.

And yet, with recognizable talent like this, it was bound to happen. Raised in Washington D.C. and heir to the fortune behind the Spiegel catalog, Jonze ruled MTV this year with his furiously funky videos — emerging as the best and most recognizable video director since Madonna/Paula Abdul/ George Michael dazzler David Fincher.

His record is impressive — there's the goofy, underwater hijinks of The Breeders' "Cannonball" (made with Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon) and the inspired silliness of Dinosaur Jr.'s "Feel the Pain" and Weezer's "Undone — The Sweater Song." Then there's his hilarious pop-cultural iconization of "Happy Days" restaurateur Al in the aforementioned "Buddy Holly" video.

But it's his clip for the Beastie Boys' "Sabotage" that will be remembered as the video youth mainstream was finally ready for. The film was so clever in both delivery and style that its appeal could extend from fanatical cinephiles to our own pop culture consciousness.

With its complex, interweaving narrative, gross–out gore and Tarantino's hip, rapid–fire dialogue, Fiction managed to kick–start the director's career (not to mention some of the actors) and change the face of popular cinema as we know it. Now, the director (who never even finished high school) has become both the hottest property in Hollywood and the coffee–shop talk of intellectual blow–hards across the country.

"Have you ever noticed how?" is a line being heard less and less as sketch comedy shows are cropping up all over the place. The king of sketch comedy ("Saturday Night Live") has stumbled in recent years and now is competing with shows like "The Newz," "The State," "The Vacant Lot" and even old reruns of "The Kids in The Hall" for the throne. Where's "Monty Python's Flying Circus" when you need them?

Hopefully more rap artists will follow these bands' example and start touring more frequently.

• For all of you who are in search of the next Pearl Jam, the annual Loud Music Festival was the place to be. Over 50 bands performed over a three day span — as a result there was hardly a shortage of new music. The festival featured both local musicians as well as many up and coming national bands. Among the more well–known bands who performed were Small Factory, Come and The Dambuilders.

The Valley may be diffusing its own limitless potential, which goes to say that, in many ways, the area is really just one club away from being a new musical hot spot.

• In years past, bands such as the Beastie Boys and Queen Latifah have brought their cutting edge sounds to Spring Concert. Unfortunately, this year the show featured too many bands that had already seen their prime. Both the Violent Femmes and Black Uhuru played uneventful sets that did nothing more than regurgitate old hits. Thankfully the two acts featuring UMass alumni, Buffalo Tom and Taj Mahal, saved the show from being a total disaster.

• Almost 10 years ago, Dinosaur Jr. were banned from playing local area clubs because their ear–drum splitting sound was deemed to loud. This past September J. Maseis and Co. plugged in their amplifiers for one more sonic assault at the Iron Horse. The show featured most of the songs from their recent album, Without A Sound. While their performance was a rare treat for the area, it unfortunately was probably the last chance for many fans to see their band before success forces them to play larger venues.

• For everyone who still thinks that The Offspring are punk rock, take a listen to Team Dresch. For the few who attended this show at Hampshire College, they were rewarded with the best shows of the year. This all girl, all queer band from Portland Oregon are arguably the most talented new artists to emerge from the Northwest. Sorry to all those who missed it.

• Phish must be doing something right. Last May they sold out the Mullins Center and then just five months later they returned for another sold out show. Phish–heads came from all over the east coast to see their favorite band. Overheard from one guy, "I have seen Phish 87 times and this was the worst show yet." Maybe they have reached their prime. Let's hope so.

• Indie–rock night at the Bluewall. Not since Superchunk played in 1992 has this campus seen a cutting edge rock show as good as Helium and Polvo. Both groups more than proved they are among the most progressive and intriguing guitar bands around. Polvo took their Sonic Youth influences and brings them to another level while Helium proved to be Boston's most interesting export since the Pixies.

• For years, UPC has brought quality acts to this campus and now we can add Swirlies and Velocity Girl to the list. Both of these bands were once plagued with comparisons to My Bloody Valentine, but no longer. Swirlies were most impressive as they combined pop melodies with guitar experimentation, while Velocity Girl dazzled the audience with their own form of bubblegum pop.

• A punk rock show in an arena? Its hard to imagine, but both the crowd and Green Day pulled it off quite well. The floor of the Mullins Center resembled a battlefield, as frat boys wearing their new plaid shirts mushed alongside with high school punks dressed in all black leather. Punk rock has finally become music for than just the alienated.

Despite some creative performances and a few stellar shows, 1994 was hardly the best year for live music. While the Valley has become a wonderful place for established bands to play, a struggle remains for new and local bands in finding a place to perform.

Largely due to a combination of the area's apathy and clubs' somewhat restrictive policies on booking and age requirements — the Valley may be diffusing its own limitless potential. Which goes to say that, in many ways, the area is really just one club away from being a new musical hot spot.

signing to Atlantic Records, catapulted her to a cult status before her next album could even be recorded.

Even though she received lots of airplay for Exile In Guyville, nothing could compare to the level of attention she has earned for her second release, Whip–Smart. The first single, "Supernova," has been picked up by MTV as a "Buzz Clip," and the album has been on heavy rotation on college as well as commercial radio ever since its release.

There is no meself just like any other artist, playing on the feminist label theystory about why Phair has such appeal musically and in the media. She markets her media has tagged her but not going over the edge of Marketing Cliff like Madonna. A lot of that has to do with her music: punchy, no–frills pop dripping with heart–on–her–sleeve lyrics that evoke visions of all aspects of relationships.

Liz Phair was destined for greatness, and her Rolling Stone cover and feature story has dispelled any myths that she would wallow in obscurity for a long time, wondering when her break would come. It has come already.

that catapulted Jonze to alternative nation fame. Spoofing '70s cop show cliches with whiplash fervor, Jonze made the most memorable — and dizzying — video of the year.

In a medium where black bars on the tops and bottoms of videos passes for innovation, Jonze woke up weary MTV viewers tiring of Janet Jackson's navel. And unlike the arty pretentiousness of the other noted video director Kevin Kerslake (whose clip for Stone Temple Pilot's "Vaseline" is corporate alternative at its most tedious), Jonze is refreshingly free of pomposity.

Now working on the video for R.E.M.'s upcoming single "Crush With Eyeliner" (the band's clip for "Everybody Hurts" beat "Sabotage" for Breakthrough Video Award, by the way) Spike Jonze seems poised on the edge of reaping the rewards of mainstream fame. And if there's anyone who can keep his alterna–integrity, the no–frills, laid–back Jonze is that man.

TIMELINE

Pop! goes the culture in a look back at the year that was

Compiled by Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

January

• The apple fell in Times Square. The immortal Dick Clark was there to host yet another "Rockin' Eve" party.

• The first couple threw a party at the White House and days later Clinton is accused of six (count 'em six) extramarital affairs.

• Barbara Streisand battles stage fright to open long awaited tour at MGM Grand in Las Vegas.

• Nancy "Why me!" Kerrigan is clubbed by unknown assailant at Detroit's Cobo Hall. The plot thickens days later when fellow skater Tonya Harding becomes a key suspect along with bodyguard Shawn Eckardt and ex–husband Jeff Gillooly.

• Hubble telescope, a multi–million dollar piece of equipment doesn't work! NASA spends another couple million to have it repaired. No longer myopic, the scope can see 12 billion light years away.

• Earthquake hits California and pronounced the worst in 25 years, measuring 6.6 on the Richter scale and lasting 40 seconds. The quake killed 55 people and damaged highway systems.

•Virginia Kelley, 71, and mother of President Clinton, passes away.

•Oh wedded bliss! Multi–millionaire Donald Trump weds mistress Marla Maples in big celebrity ceremony that only money and scandal can buy.

February

• The shortest month of the year opens with President Clinton giving his State of the Union Address and messing up TV viewers' nightly shows.

• Prince Charles is almost assassinated in Australia as a man jumps on stage and fires at "the man who would be king" — with blanks.

• NKOTB, formerly New Kids On the Block (big difference), that heaven–sent group from the "streets" of Beantown, unveil a new image with the release of their album, Face the Music. Here's a surprise: it b–o–m–b–e–d.

• US Olympic speed skater, Dan Jansen, finally brings home a Gold medal.

March

• Bonnie Blair, world champion speed skater wins fourth and fifth Gold medal.

• Oksana Baiul wins the Gold metal for ice skating. Poor you–know–who (Nancy Kerrigan) get's a Silver, along with several multi–thousand dollar endorsement deals and a trip to Disney World, missing the closing ceremonies.

• Academy Awards air with hostess with the mostess Whoopie Goldberg. Anna Paquin becomes the youngest person to win Best Supporting Actress award at age 11 year old.

• Deal of the decade: Paramount and Viacom merge into one big money making company.

• Old Blue eyes, Frank Sinatra collapses in Richmond, Va. Son, Frankie Jr. is connected with Hollywood madam Heidi Fleiss. His publicists denies the rumor.

• First talks are initiated between Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chief Yassar Arafat in Cairo, Egypt.

• Big month for interviewing criminal notables. NBC's "Dateline" gets personal with serial killer Jeffery Dahmer. ABC counters with "Turning Point's" Diane Sawyer insulted by the infamous Charles Manson during an interview.

• Tonya Harding confesses to aiding ex–husband in Kerrigan attack and resigns for US Figure Skating Association, ending her career.

FASHION

Direct from the Paris runways, a pret-a-porter glance at what they wore

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

1994 was without a doubt the year of glamour. Designers turned to the silver screen for inspirations, trying their best to emulate the style and chic that Bacall, Lake and Hepburn possessed right down to pearl chokers, elbow length gloves and marcel waves. But everything has a price and with the return to glamour came the cost of authenticity, proving once and for all that there's nothing like the real thing.

When one looks at fashion— cosmopolitan wise, they have to take into consideration that fashion is an art form. It isn't about wearibility (that's left up to mass production) but style, imagination, creativity, a lot of guts — and a lot of money.

In order to give off the air of the nouveau riche, jeweler's business' boomed. Magazines were plastered with ads and the slogan "Nothing Makes You Feel As Good As Gold" not just 10k but 18k and up. Estee Lauder and Yves Saint Laurent both created a golden compact collection. Gold eyeshadow, brush handles, and cigarette cases were also in vogue.

Tiffany & Co. went berserk with fresh water pearls and diamonds were once again a girl's best friend. From tennis bracelets to tear drop bobs, supermodel Cindy Crawford was adorned in them and Kay Jewelers jumped for joy.

Wrist watches became another piece de resistance. Even Joan Rivers had a dainty padlock style watch to peddle on QVC.

Joining the ranks of realism was the return to fur. Yes, real fur. Model Yasmin La Bon was seen plastered across layouts four pages long, smothered in mink, beaver and fox from American Legend. Surprisingly enough, with the exception of Ricki Lake at Lagerfeld's offing, not many people made a ruckus. Make no mistake about it, a status symbol was reborn.

Cashmere was once again a best–selling material and was used to construct everything from the basic half–sweater to the exotic thong bikini. It seems that this material also sparked a big comeback for color. Gone were the boring and invisible neutrals of old. In their places sprung bright neon pinks, greens and yellows, blinding onlookers of runway shows and bringing back the art to fashion.

Thigh high stockings entered the market thanks to Ralph Lauren's young line: Ralph. Designers like Karl Lagerfeld took up the idea but claimed he liked them better on the run way. Patterned, plaid, striped and solid stockings were shown off by the A–line shirt. The kilt also made a comeback to join the ranks of the fashion conscious along with parochial school uniforms. It seems that everyone was decked out in crested blazers, knee socks, Mary Janes and pleated skirts.

Another hot item designers reiterated was the tuxedo — for women. Black velvet, satin and wool proved to be the basis for designers like Lagerfeld, and Gucci to come up with the modern day tux, more form fitting, cleaner cut and definitely chic.

Pants and pant suits by the Anne Klein II collection and the Liz Clairhorne Collection Cotton also continued to attract women in the work place. They were no nonsense and all business, but with a softer drape, more pliable material and definitely feminine, but with an edge.

Naomi Campbell made 1994 a supermodel year.

FOURTEEN MAGAZINE

Of course some designers realized the inaccessibility of their works and added more subtle pieces for buyers to choose from. The slip dress is still one of the top styles of dress and came in whispers of silk and gauze. Donna Karan and Calvin Klein are two top designers of this style.

And speaking of colors, silver, gold and bronze have also made a big comeback. Once seen as flashy and gaudy, silver shimmers in every shape and form. Shirt skirts, swimsuits and tailored jackets all boast the luster of liquid silver. Another color of note is red. Blazing, fiery and full of life, red is the signature color of royalty.

Glamorous dresses like those designed by Jill Sander and Geoffrey Beene inspired shoes on equal footing. Satin mules, spiked and stiletto heels tramped up and down runways. Satin, plastic and leather straps encircled delicate ankles. Heels were dipped in gold, painted shocking pink, and twisted to match designers' moods and everyone strove to put their best/elegant foot forward.

Goose down and the bomber jacket made a comeback along with tacky fake fur trim. Quilted short designs and the swing coat have shown up in Bill Blass' coat line.

Perhaps the most significant creation this year was the return of the female form. The waist was the target of most designers like Christian Dior. Tucked, tied, belted or strapped–in by hyera, the hourglass figure was heavily emphasized.

Ever since Kate Moss declared her ability to swallow food, women have been busting out (literally) everywhere. Like the boom of the corset, padded bras have been selling like hot cakes as the less blessed female tried to reach inhuman measurements. (Tori Spelling? The Wonderbra and the Miracle Bra by Victoria Secret have become wardrobe necessities. Silicone has gone the way of cotton batting and everyone is happy.

In the meantime, supermodels Claudia, Cindy and even Anna Nicole were back in business flashing cleavage everywhere. Designer Jean Paul Gaultier jumped right on the bandwagon with his new perfume "Haute Parfumerie" and paid homage to the female form by designing the bottle after it.

Yet despite the fancy packaging and names, vanilla was the scent of the year: Vanilla Musk, Vanilla Fields and French Vanilla being top sellers. Incidentally, housewives have been known to dab a little extract behind the ears for that special homey scent. (Who would of known smelling like baked goods could be so sexy?)

Of course there are always a few things that flop mightily. Take for instance the growing number of "Home" collections that designers are trying to cash in on. Guess, Klein and Ralph Lauren being just three. The idea is nice, match your bra and panties to you're couch but it isn't very accessible. If you can't afford the scarf, what makes you think you'll splurge on a sheet set?

Italian designers Gianni Versace and Giorgio Armani were both targets of investigation after being suspected of bribing tax officials with a total of $100,00. However this isn't stopping Versace's advertising onslaught featuring models Crawford, Schiffer, and Turlington.

Squinces also raised their gaudy heads and remained on the runways only due to practicality. Feather boas and masks also remained too haute to wear, along with modern day corsets and gaudy dresses that resembled picnic table cloths. The tiny weeny bikini reared it's ugly head making less to be more and the average woman looking for cover ups.

Of course with the boom for better bodies came a barrage of cellulosi creams and gadgets made to burn away pockets of unsightly flab. Christian Dior and Clarins both came out with serums and creams promising suvelt thighs and buttocks. Blond became the color of the moment with Kate Moss, Helena Christianson, and Linda Evangelista all going golden. Alas the fashion world bid a found adieu to Supermodel Christy Turlington's runway career.

So one might say that 1994 is the year of money because you needed a lot of it to achieve the desired look. Great for celebs and other upper class people, but it definitely left the everydas joan doing nothing but window shopping.

The Best Films of 1994

1. Hoop Dreams

How can a nearly three hour documentary following five years in the lives of NBA hopefuls William Gates and Arthur Agee be the best film of the year? Those who ask that question obviously haven't seen the movie.

Hoop Dreams is more than an extraordinary documentary, it's the most moving, suspenseful, affecting film of the year. With its real life characters struggling through success and disappointment, Hoop Dreams approaches levels of intimacy and power unseen in fiction films. It's because while Hoop follows a narrative pattern, the answers aren't easy, the solutions far from neat.

And, at its best moments, Hoop Dreams tangles with the price of dreaming, how the cruel reality of the cards fate have dealt own was of building up hopes . . . and tumbling them down.

Liz Phair is 'Whip-Smart' while the Beastie Boys suffer an 'Ill Communication'

The Best Albums of 1994

1. Liz Phair / Whip-Smart

It is easy to get caught up in all the hype surrounding Liz Phair. The foul mouthed, pop-princess has been accused by many as being nothing more than some good looks and a handful of four-letter words. But to just dismiss her as just a Madonna wanna-be for the alternative nation would be unfair, as well as unjust.

With Whip-Smart, the follow-up to her critically lauded debut Exile In Guyville, Phair eluded the critical naysayers who were just waiting to say "I told you so," while giving the finger to the sweaty machismo that currently dominates much of the Buzz Bin hopefuls.

By taking the solid foundation she laid down with Guyville and building something entirely more interesting, Phair created the most unpretentious, sonicly adventurous and lyrically stimulating album of the year. From the fuzzed-out bliss of "Supernova" to the echoing swirl of "Shane," Whip- Smart documented Phair's maturation from the fragile song- smith of her debut to a full-on pop powerhouse.

As with rock n' roll's best albums, Whip-Smart never tries to exceed its own limitations. Brash, tuneful and intelligent, the album remains strong form start to finish, without ever sounding same-is or calculated. (Matt Audette)

2. The London Suede / Dog Man Star

Depending on your view, the London Suede's second album is either overblown and underwhelming, or over- ambitious and unsurpassed. Either way the album demands attention. Dog Man Star fuses American glitz with English grime on tracks like "This Hollywood Life" and "The Asphalt World," and orchestral strings with singer Brett Anderson's pseudo-operatic posturing on "Black and Blue" and "Still Life."

Due to this diversity, listeners will likely be polarized, either loving or hating Dog Man Star. It would be a great shame, however, if this album was ignored. Huge in their homeland, America remains the Impossible Dream for the London Suede. This may prove to be their masterpiece, as multi-talented maestro Bernard Butler, who wrote the music for this album, has since left the band. For now, as a document of a great British group shining in an often gray, grungy musical climate, Dog Man Star transcends the hype. (Martyn Bone)

3. Jon Spencer Blues Explosion / Orange

To say that Orange is one of the most original and innovative albums to be released in years would still be an understatement. Jon Spencer has made a career out of pushing the boundaries of musical invention into uncharted realms by striving to unite the worlds of traditional blues and free-form experimental noise.

Orange is the crowning achievement of his efforts. From the sleazy grit of "Sweat" to the classic rock-gone-horribly- awry flavor of "Brenda," he has taken the essence of the blues and incorporated it into his own uniquely haphazard framework. In doing so, Spencer has succeeded in creating an entirely new genre in which he and his Blues Explosion reign supreme. (Matthew Justin Faerber)

4. Pavement / Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain

The boys in Pavement have finally grown up. Just a few years ago this band came out of nowhere and released Perfect Sound Forever. Little was known about them but every pompous music critic and college radio DJ claimed they had found the next big thing. One problem: Pavement didn't want to be rock stars.

It looks as if since then Pavement has changed their tune. For Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain the band abandoned their four track recorders for a plush high tech studio and opted for a more direct approach.

The album is a sellout and masterpiece at the same. While tracks such "Cut Your Hair" and "Gold Soundz" seemed more like stabs at commercial status, the opening two songs "Silence Kit" and "Elevate Me Later" are among the bands finest moments. Rock stardom is just around the corner for this band — and whether they'll admit it or not — they can't wait until it happens. (Michael Burke)

5. R.E.M. / Monster

This album confirmed R.E.M. as a band that can, and will, do whatever they want, even if that means taking a trip back to some earlier styles. With the vocals pushed into the background again and the guitar turned back up, R.E.M. put out an album that had a wide range of appeal.

Monster has something for the earlier fans and gave the fans that hitched on after Out Of Time a taste of what got the band to where they are today. One part Murmur, one part Document with a dash of Automatic For The People, Monster puts to rest any thoughts that Stipe and Co. might redo "Everybody Hurts" until they fade away. Rumors have circulated that the band will call it quits (if still together) on New Year's Eve 2000, but if they continue to make albums as good as Monster, they will be sorely missed. (Mike MacLean)

6. Sebadoh / Bakesale

Sebadoh is a band that continues to impress as it makes its way up the music ladder. With Bakesale the band has moved away from their forays into experimental freak-outs, focusing on tight, melodic and accessible pop songs. The music hits you with the riff right away, establishes itself just long enough to burn itself in your mind, and gets out before you even realize what has happened. "License To Confuse," "Skull" and "Rebound" leave you humming long after the disk is over, while Barlow's lyrics establish him as the undisputed crown prince of heartache. (Mike MacLean)

7. Superchunk / Foolish

After spending a couple of productive years in the national spotlight, indie-rock purists Superchunk returned to the comfort of their own North Carolina–based Merge record label to release this virtually flawless pop gem.

On Foolish, the guys (and girl) from Chapel Hill display a newfound maturity in their songwriting, mixing beautifully crafted melodies with the intensity of their old punk rock days. Even the very apparent inadequacy of Mac's vocal range becomes somehow charming in the context of such genuinely heartfelt songs as "The Firgt Part" and "Driveway To Driveway." No doubt about it, when it comes to good ol' honest, guitar-driven pop, Superchunk is as good as it gets. (Matthew Justin Faerber)

8. Versus / The Stars Are Insane

So who is this band? Another obscure underground rock band that has little talent but is played on college radio? Hardly. Versus exploded on the scene two years ago and since then has left all others in awe. With The Stars Are Insane, the band's first full length release, they have revealed that special something that so many other bands today want badly.

Unlike their previous upbeat singles the albums dwells more on the band's somber side, but does not lack in power. Not since Nirvana has a band had a sound that amazingly transcends its own familiarity with sheer intensity. Startling debut from the best new American band of recent memory. (Michael Burke)

9. Blur / Parklife

What the hell happened to Blur? Three years ago the mop- topped Brits were dishing out run-of-the-mill, drug-hazed, "Manchester" dance pop and seemed to have about as much chance of sticking around as Right Said Fred.

Suddenly they make a stylistic detour into the dying world of British pop and they've gone and become England's finest musical export in a long while.

With Parklife, the band's third release, the boys in Blur take you on a time traveling journey through the last forty years of British music without sounding forced in the least. Whether it be the Jam-is "Tracy Jacks," the Syd Barrett head-trip of "Far Out," or the Euro–synth trash of "Girls And Boys," Blur proved that a new British invasion might not be such a bad idea after all. (Matt Audette)

10. Neil Young and Crazy Horse / Sleeps with Angels

Consider this — will Liz Phair still be competing on the Top Ten album lists of 2019? Young's debut and sophomore solo albums were released in 1969, but as William Faulkner once noted, it's better to prevail than to merely endure, and Young's relevance to the Woodstock generation (original 1969 and unoriginal 1994) is reaffirmed by this album.

The example of Young suggests that the ghost who infamously haunts this album might have heeded Young's famous line "it's better to burn out than to fade away" on an artistic rather than personal level. Sleeps with Angels is another example of Neil Young's perpetual re-invention, whilst reciting and re-evoking themes, dreams and screams from throughout his career. If music could not save Cobain in this tragic year, Young shows that, at least rock and roll will never die. (Martyn Bone)

John Mellencamp / Dance Naked

What's so great about Mellencamp's latest effort is hidden in plain sight in the album's title track. A simple, straightforward song about uncomplicated desire, "Dance Naked" is an apt metaphor the entire CD's stripped down, uncalculated feel. Recorded and mixed in a few short weeks and totalling a scant 30 minutes, Dance Naked makes a credible case for the joys of uncluttered rock and roll and ego-less pretention.

Even the CD's big hit, "Wild Night" gains sincerity when taken away from its VH-1/hit radio status — a fitful groove in good company. Make no mistake; while the tracks are musically austere, its messages are just as complex as we've come to expect from the criminally underrated Mellencamp. And the artist himself shares a bit of this contradiction: an "aging" rocker who still has the talent — and the gams — to dance naked with the best of them. (Jon Lupo)

Unconventional Awards for an Unforgettable Year

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

With American music culture moving in cycles at what seems to be an exponential rate, it should come as no surprise that in 1994 Andy Warhol's concept of 15 minutes of fame applied to just about everyone who could pick up a guitar (or at least get someone else to do it for them).

This dizzying quantity of music set the stage for an enormous range of quality. In an effort to sort some of it out, I submit for your approval (and no doubt, disapproval) this year's Best and Worst awards.

Worst Impersonation of a Punk Band: Offspring

How did this sorry bunch of posers ever earn the reputation of heralds of "the new punk" when they actually sound more like "Headbangers' Ball" rejects with a sugar rush? It just goes to show, if enough MTV personalities say it, it must be right.

Best One Man Live Show: Jonathon Richman at the Iron Horse

Like the good's rock and roll uncle you never had, Richman can express an astounding depth of emotion with just his voice and a guitar. His quick wit and beautiful songs put a smile on the face of every non-lobotomized person in attendance at the Iron Horse.

Best P.R. Smoke Screen: Aerosmith

Thanks to the immense popularity of their under-aged, sex-symbol video girl, these rock dinosaurs have managed to distract another generation from the fact that they're basically just a washed-up glam band that wasn't even that good in its prime.

Best Band Nome: Anus the Menace

To be honest, I don't know who they are or what they sound like, but with a name like that how can you go wrong?

Worst Single: "Black Hole Sun" by Soundgarden

It seemed like every time I turned on the radio this summer, the airwaves were saturated with this pretentious, derivative nonsense. After a while, I started relating to Harvey Kietel when he blows away his car stereo in Bad Lieutenant.

Best Single You Don't Want to Admit You Like: "Whatta-Man" by Salt-n-Pepa & En Vogue

Come on, be honest. You know you love it.

Most Pathetic Comeback: Jimmy Page & Robert Plant

Anybody who could keep a straight face during that forest scene on their MTV special probably thinks that This is Spinal Tap is a real documentary.

Worst Compilation Trend "Alternative" Soundtracks

From The Crow to Clerks, the logic seems clear. Take a film that needs all the help it can get, add a soundtrack full of thankfully lost B-sides and album rejects, and wait for the slacker bucks to start rolling in.

Best Collaboration: The Jesus and Mary Chain & Hope Sandoval

Britain's greatest songwriting duo since Lennon/ McCartney meets the best set of female vocal chords in music today. What else could the result be but one of the best pop songs of the year?

Best Collaboration We'll Never Hear: Kurt Cobain and Michael Stipe

What could have been a dream come true for millions of music fans died with Cobain. In the weeks before his suicide, the two greatest figures in popular music had been working on material for an album together. Unfortunately, nothing from their collaboration was ever recorded.

Most Disappointing Live Band: Smashing Pumpkins

Thousands of pumpkins fans shelled out the $30-plus to see their favorite band headline Lollapalooza this summer. What they got sounded more like Axl Rose and a jumble of poorly-tuned guitars than anything off Siamese Dream. The moral: Never underestimate the value of a good producer.

Best Mossachusetts Band: Doc Hopper

With the Bosstones evidently having run out of good songs and the Lemonheads reduced to comedic at best, Doc Hopper seems to be the hottest prospect on the Boston music scene. This past year, they released their first full-length album Aloha, and their show at Earthfoods earlier this semester was easily the best on-campus performance of the year.

Worst Single Spawned by the Whole '70s Retro Trend: "The Most Beautiful Girl In The World" by Prince (or whatever foolish alias he's going by)

The Bee Gees are gone. Let's please try and keep it that way.

Worst Non–Musical Side Project: Kim Gordon's "X– Girl" Clothing

Earlier this year, Sonic Youth's bassist came out with this line of

LEGACY

A final curtain call for the entertainers who bowed out in '94

By Mike MacLean & Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Society lost some extraordinary people this year. Among them were actors, musicians, authors and other top names in pop culture. Their talents and presence will surely be missed by all who knew them or had their lives enriched by them.

Claude Akins (73, actor)
Akins was a veteran of television for over 40 years, he made his debut in From Here to Eternity, but will be most remembered for his role in the television show "Bl and The Bear."

Charles Bukowski (82, author)
One of the most highly acclaimed figures in modern literature and poetry, Bukowski's works have been published worldwide in dozens of languages. His life and times were also immortalized in the film Barfly, for which he wrote the screenplay.

Cabell ("Cab") Calloway (86, performer)
Calloway was a hit of the big band era and classic cool. His trademark song was "Minnie the Moocher," which he performed in the movie The Blues Brothers. He most recently had a cameo in Janet Jackson's video, "Alright" off of her album Rhythm Nation.

John Candy (43, actor/comedian)
Candy began his rise to fame in the sketch comedy series "SCTV," which ran from 1977 to 1983 in Canada and the United States. He made his breakthrough in film playing beside Tom Hanks in Splash. Some of his other film successes included Uncle Buck, Planes Trains and Automobiles and most recently, the surprise hit Cool Runnings. His last film was Wagons East.

James Clavell (69, author)
Clavell was the author of such books as Tai-Pan, Shogun and The Noble House. The latter novel was made into a hit mini-series starring the new 007, Pierce Brosnan.

William Conrad (73, actor)
Played the title role in the popular '70s cop show, "Cannon." His most recent role was in the television program "Jake and The Fatman."

Andre Escobar (27, Columbian soccer player)
During the World Cup series, America astounded the country by beating the top Columbian team. Unfortunately, Escobar deflected the ball into his team's net. When he returned to his country, he was shot to death by an angry fan outside a bar.

Raul Julia (54, actor)
He was discovered in a San Juan, Puerto Rico, His most memorable films include Kiss of the Spider Woman, The Adams Family and Adams Family Values. He dabbled in Shakespeare playing roles in productions of King Lear and The Two Gentlemen of Verona. His last picture, Street Fighter, is due out this winter.

Jack Kirby (76, comic book artist)
You may not know his name, but you undoubtedly have at one time or another followed the escapades of his creations. Kirby played a vital part in the development of such comic book heros as Captain America, Spiderman, The X–Men and The Incredible Hulk.

Burt Lancaster (81, actor)
A legendary actor and Hollywood sex symbol. It was his famous kiss with Deborah Kerr in From Here to Eternity on that sandy beach women dreamed about for years to come. Other films include The Swimmer, Atlantic City and Tough Guys.

William Leonard (78, CBS President)
Hob–nobbed with journalist greats Walter Cronkite and Dan Rather and helped create the award winning television news program "60 Minutes."

Henry Mancini (70, composer)
Mancini's most memorable compositions include "The Pink Panther Theme" and "Peter Gunn." He also scored music for Breakfast At Tiffany's and other movies.

Carmen McRae (74, jazz singer)
Known for her dynamic voice and ability to bring meaning to music, McRae could sing everything from Cole Porter and Billy Joel. Her career was launched when she won a amateur contest at Harlem's Apollo Theater at age 17.

Kurt Cobain

Mildred Natwick (89, actress)
An established character actress, she starred in Barefoot in the Park for which she received an Oscar nomination. She also starred in the critically acclaimed film Dangerous Liaisons.

Harriet Nelson (85, actress)
This actress was best know for her famous role as Harriet in the hit sitcom "Ozzy & Harriet."

Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy Onassis (64, former First Lady, book editor)
Known affectionately as Jackie O. by the public, the former first lady had tried to lead a somewhat less prominent lifestyle since leaving the White House. She had been working as an editor and doing various charity work before her death.

George Peppard, (65, actor)
Actor best remembered for his roles in Breakfast at Tiffany's and the popular television series, "The A-Team."

John Preston (48, author, activist)
Besides being an author, Preston was a pioneer as a co-founder of one of the country's first gay community centers.

Martha Raye (78, musician)
Best known for her role in Rhythm On the Range with Bing Crosby, Martha Raye's is most remembered by this generation as the Super Poly-Grip denture adhesive spokesperson with the killer smile.

Cesar Romero (86, actor)
Romero played Jane Wyman's husband on the TV series, "Falcon Crest," but most probably remember him as portraying the Joker on the television show "Batman."

Jerry Rubin (54, activist)
He was ranked as the most flamboyant anti war demonstrators in the 1960s and tried to a pig elected president. In the 1970s he turned to spiritualism and yoga and in the 1980s he became an established business man.

Dick Sargent (64, actor)
Sargent was best remembered for his role as Darren on the TV show "Bewitched."

Telly Savalas (70, actor)
Even though he earned an Oscar nomination for his supporting role in Birdman of Alcatraz, Savalas is best known for his role in the popular cop show "Kojak." Most recently remembered his commercials for Players Club International.

Jessica Tandy (85, actress)
She won Best Actress award for her role in Driving Miss Daisy. Her film credits include Alfred Hitchcock's The Birds, Fried Green Tomatoes and this years's Nobody's Fool with Paul Newman.

Pedro Zamora (22, AIDS activist)
Zamora was one of the housemates on MTV's "The Real World III," and also an AIDS activist. He crusaded for an increase in understanding the disease and those who lived with it by organizing and participating in lectures and congressional testimonies.

Kurt Cobain 1967-1994

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

By now we have all heard the story a thousand times of how a teenage malcontent from a small logging town in Washington was miraculously bestowed by a desperate public as the musical messiah of the '90s. Then, as quickly as he rose, he crashed and burned — largely due to the pressures of personal strife and a public that expected everything form their self-made hero, but returned nothing.

Tortured between his ideals as a musician and the problems that an unexpected (and perhaps unwanted) fame brought on, Kurt Cobain's life played itself out to the cliche of the "tortured artist" perfectly.

Although many were quick to put Cobain on the "spokesperson for a generation" pedestal, in actuality, his life was more a metaphor for what is wrong with today's society. Behind all the power chords and screams was someone the world was waiting for — someone just like them. In a world full of Bonos and Axl Roses, Cobain was refreshingly "un–rock star." It seemed for the first time in ages a musician was talking to his audience rather than talking down from some larger than life persona.

If 1994 was the year that punk rock broke, then it was also the year that its true spirit was finally lowered into the ground. If ever there was an artist truer to the principles of what it meant to be punk — it was Cobain.

By just being themselves Cobain and Nirvana managed to singlehandedly turn the direction that popular rock music was heading around and at the same time bring to it a renewed sense of honesty — for that we will be forever in debt.

In the end Cobain should be remembered, not for, his Shakespearian fall from grace, but rather for his art. If his one true gift to the world was anything, it was his music. Although it is impossible to say where his career would have gone, the biggest crime is that we will never know what potential he may have tapped into.

When asked once if he thought that up and coming bands were influenced by Nirvana's sound, he responded that he hoped people were just influenced by his band's integrity. And if nothing else that was what Cobain was a shining example of. Until the end he was constantly self-promoting his favorite underground bands, worrying over the cries of "sell-out" and wearing that same old ratty, green sweater.

tape and pillage mall fats' wallets with Ace Ventura Pet Detective, his second coming of Lewis (Mental note: Dean Martin, please stay buried).

April showers bring May flowers. Beverly Hills Cop III must have been a swamp lily. Hidden within the stormy month a few gems did appear. John Cusack's Sweet is enchanted and Tim Robbins' turn in The Hudsucker Proxy was entertaining to the few who'd seen it.

Now the summer was the most curious lot. More blockbusters than ever! Less 'effing' looked great. Well, let's see — Gump happened? Try to speak badly about the national institution. Still there were those brave souls who bucked the trend. They've got themselves a little support group nestled somewhere in America's heartland, though.

Special dreadees were the rage of summer entertainment. While The Mask showcased schizophrenia and True Lies found an audience for domestic violence, it's no wonder Gump happened. Forrest Gump was the lone good guy in a sea of power mongers, unless you remember Nicholas Cage in It Could Happen To You, but it had to be seen to be forgotten.

Anyway as summer's fast flight shone Gump and The Lion King, Wyatt Earp never recouped its mammoth budget, Blown Away painted Boston as a quasi-Little Ireland with accents by way of the Bronx and featuring Lloyd Bridges as some brazen booze-hound leprechaun. As a closing blow, Oliver Stone left half of America sick and shell-shocked with Natural Born Killers. The other half was laughing too hard.

Once the suit and tuff face clears the air, fall arrives dressed to the nines, hankies in hand. They came anticipated, they left unnoticed. The War, Stargate and Mary Shelly's Frankenstein... all much ado about nothing. But ultra-violence was chic so Pulp Fiction's Quentin Tarantino padded his pockets and ego. The French can be so kind.

As October drew to a close, all Hallow's Eve was notable for a good Nightmare on Elm Street (yawn). But buried within the torrid month was a green drama, a poetic prison escape flick and wrenching date movie drawing its inspiration from a Steven King tale. The movie was as good as any released this year, but cursed with a title too big for any multiplex marquee: The Shawshank Redemption.

This holiday season had its spectacle: Tom Cruise parlayed Anne Rice's bits, and become the best thing in a somewhat lackluster vampire soap. Rice put her criticism aside and watched the legions of bizarre but oh so faithful undead followers her home phone number in hopes of a little midnight dish.

Disney stuck again with its mass production line holiday number, this time sending Tim Allen's The Santa Clause, prepackaged with a five minute Pochahantas preview (can't wait for that big genocide showstopper) guaranteeing another predicted cash cow.

So now it's Christmas. December's biological clock is running down, Disney's pouring out some live action flutt and studios are readying Cobb and Legends Of the Fall for a Dec. 31 11:00 p.m. showing (got to slip under that Academy Award window, you know).

This year offered big, ready-made bundles and left everyone feeling slightly unsatisfied. Tom Arnold...Best Supporting Actor?? In a year where that's a dark horse possibility, you know — the times are a changing.

grams have had strong, direct ties to real-life social issues and personalities prevalent in American culture.

Many shows I regard as particularly bad have somehow failed to measure up to these media-savvy, turbulent times. After all, what sensible adult really wants to bother with the dull, plastic domesticity of, say ABC's "Step by Step," when there's the down-to-earth, working-class humor of ABC's "Grace Under Fire?"

I think today's viewers are more interested than ever in seeing how our real world translates to the small screen, and are losing their patience with shows that are content to remain in the realms of witless slapstick comedy and drab melodrama.

The resurging popularity of such dramas as "Homicide" and "ER" is only one example of how viewers are investing more of their television-watching time into shows that reflect real-life concerns. It seems like this year we've also been bombarded by more new talk shows and prime-time newsmagazines than any one person could possibly handle.

Popular nighttime talk shows — which thrived on satirical take-offs of current events were hyped up nearly enough to be considered media events in themselves. David Letterman's sarcastic antics brought him to the top of the heap, while Arsenio bid his final farewells and NBC's team of Jay and Conan struggled to become more hip and competitive.

NBC fared better with their newsmagazine hit "Dateline," which was expanded to an unprecedented three nights a week, while the syndicated "Ricki Lake" has inexplicably attracted a large enough young audience to challenge the reign of talk show queen Oprah Winfrey. Add the relatively new talents of Marilu Henner, Rolanda Watts, Jon Stewart, and Greg Kinnear, and American audiences have access to more celebrity scandals and family dysfunctions than they ever dreamed existed.

And if those don't satisfy our curiosity, the evening tabloids such as "Hard Copy" and "A Current Affair" will be more than happy to provide for some of our more shameful, voyeuristic needs.

So what's going on here? Well, "reality" TV may be the defining media movement of the '90s, but there are a few reasons why the trend was particularly strong during this past year.

The scandal surrounding former football star O.J. Simpson's suspected involvement in the murder of his wife and her friend allowed television in some profound ways during the summer of 1994. In one of the most incredible live broadcasts since the shooting of Lee Harvey Oswald, O.J.'s pursuit and capture helped to reestablish television as a revolutionary means of communications that can give viewers an uniquely exciting, up-close connection to the outside world and to celebrities particularly.

Plus the pre-trial hearing following O.J.'s arrest (which was broadcast, at least in part, by all major networks) allowed the American public a far more detailed, accurate look into our legal system than any other programming in television history. Soon after, it seemed that almost every weekly series from "Seinfeld" to "Dateline" to "Law and Order" was retelling or recreating the O.J. story, and as a result, it quickly became a permanent contemporary pop culture.

The Simpson scandal was crucial to the advance of "reality" television because it effectively blurred the distinctions between what is real, and what is "only a TV show." Seeing his white Bronco being followed by no less than a dozen police cruisers down that California highway, the whole thing felt unreal, as if I was watching some fantastic action series. But with no script or stunt doubles to fall back on, we've become so overwhelmed and aroused by the reality of such broadcasts, that after awhile the average laugh-a-minute sitcom begins to seem rather tame by comparison.

But it hasn't just been O.J. Simpson who's captured the nation's interest and imagination. This year a lot of TV's most scandalous plot lines have been surfacing behind the camera, instead of in front of it.

It seemed like wherever you looked, media celebrities were getting into some kind of trouble, and heading straight to the small screen to bare their souls to the public. Whether it was Roseanne's very public, very nasty split from husband Tom Arnold, or "Price Is Right" host Bob Barker fighting against allegations of sexual harassment — the trials and tribulations of TV stars lives were big news in 1994.

Backstage battles and the departure of stars from their hit shows have also been surprisingly common this year. "NYPD Blue" star David Caruso and "Northern Exposure's" Rob Morrow chose to abruptly end their TV careers for the glamour of movies, while Michael Moriarty left NBC's "Law and Order" as a protest against censorship (huh?), and Phil Hartman wisely decided to abandon "Saturday Night Live's" sinking ship to launch his own series next year.

In 1994, we didn't have the time to waste with boring, irrelevant programming. Sure, we still want to be entertained, but we also want to take our post-modern cynicism with us to the TV set.

We want to see the important stuff, the urgent programming that speaks directly to us, the shows that give us some insight on who we are and what we are likely to become. And most of all, we want to see engaging characters who are smart, vulnerable, funny and completely imperfect. You know — people like us.

Smith tabs Simmons first Black president

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — The daughter of sharecroppers in the segregated South, Ruth Simmons has been picked to lead Smith College as the first Black president at the elite Seven Sisters schools of the Northeast.

"I grew up in circumstances that should have prevented me from being here today," she said during Thursday's announcement at Smith College. "I knew that my mind could take me anywhere — and I guess it has."

A French scholar who has been serving as vice provost at Princeton University, she will be taking over one of the most prestigious academic jobs ever attained by a Black person. Smith, a women's college in Northampton, belongs to the so-called Seven Sisters, seven private schools that once provided a female alternative to the formerly all-male Ivy League.

Simmons takes over from retiring Smith President Mary Maples Dunn on July 1. Dunn has been president for ten years.

The incoming leader said she hopes her tenure will inspire young women and minorities, especially in the inner city, who feel their horizons are limited. She said she intends to attract more of such students to Smith. Only 86 of its 2,700 students are Black. The youngest of 12 children, Simmons, 49, was born in Grapeland, in eastern Texas, at a time when Blacks were not admitted into the public colleges. She said her poor farmer parents taught her that, "though we lived in the South and . . . in segregation, we were worth something."

The family later moved to Houston. Simmons said she began to run across teachers who saw her promise and encouraged her ambition, while never dreaming society would let her rise to the top. She later studied at Dillard University, a Black school in New Orleans, and first gazed upon the heights of academia during a year as an exchange student at Wellesley College, another of the Seven Sisters.

"I've seen what women's colleges can do for women, especially in developing self-esteem and in preparing them for careers in nontraditional fields," she said.

She eventually earned a doctorate in Romance languages from Harvard University, taught French at the University of New Orleans, and worked as an administrator at California State University at Northridge, the University of Southern California, and Spelman College in Atlanta.

A specialist in Caribbean and African literature, she is credited with revitalizing Afro-American studies at Princeton and helping to bring in writer Toni Morrison and philosopher Cornel West as faculty members.

She is widely praised as an administrator ready to listen carefully, attentive to detail but skilled in forging a broad consensus, and refreshingly down-to-earth.

Women's studies a strong point in the Pioneer Valley

■ Prof comes to area to research her field

By M. Isabel Teresa
Collegian Staff

When Professor Rachel Joffe-Falmagne decided to pursue her research further during her sabbatical, she knew she wanted to be in an environment where there are women scholars from a variety of disciplines involved in women's studies research.

Joffe-Falmagne is a research associate at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center for this academic year. Joffe-Falmagne is a cognitive psychologist on sabbatical from Clark University in Worcester, where she teaches psychology and women's studies to both graduate and undergraduate students.

"Women's studies is a thoroughly interdisciplinary field" said Joffe-Falmagne. "It is really important to be in an interdisciplinary environment because the issues one studies as a feminist scholar are inherently interdisciplinary. The questions I want to ask as a feminist psychologist will also draw on feminist sociology, feminist epistemologies (theories of knowledge), and feminist analyses of science and of language."

Joffe-Falmagne first heard of the Five College Women's Studies Research Center Facility when it opened in 1991. She said she thought it was a wonderful idea because there aren't many research centers available where groups of scholars can spend a year, especially where the focus is on women's studies.

At the Five College Women's Studies Research Center Joffe-Falmagne's current research project looks at developing a feminist approach to studying reasoning. She looks at the mental processes that go on in women's minds as they derive new information from the information already received, and examines how those processes have been shaped by societal context.

Joffe-Falmagne added that language plays an important role in one's reasoning processes and that both cognitive psychologists and feminist scholars are currently examining the role played by logic.

By the end of this academic year Joffe-Falmagne hopes to have an article ready for publication that discusses the questions and ideas she has formulated from her research. She added that she hopes this article will lay the groundwork for her new research program in the next few years.

Joffe-Falmagne said that logic is intended to be an absolute system that sanctions which inferences are valid and which are not, based only on the terms of these inferences. However, some philosophers have now developed an historical critique of logic, pointing out that logical systems were developed by people (men in this case) who lived in particular societies and cultures, and who were pursuing goals shaped by those contexts.

The next phase involves looking at logic as a cultural and societal product.

Still other feminist scholars have examined language as a symbolic system that embodies cultural norms and concepts, said Joffe-Falmagne. Scholars have pointed out that public forms of language have been controlled historically by men.

In addition, she said it's known from psychological and anthropological research that language shapes individuals and societies. Joffe-Falmagne continued by stating that methods of thinking are internalized from a language that has been developed in a social world largely controlled by men.

Joffe-Falmagne's current research has taken on a new direction from her prior research and examines reasoning processes contextually.

Joffe-Falmagne's "Women in Society" undergraduate course at Clark examines how societies function in a network of power relationships and in cultures that represent women in particular ways. According to Joffe-Falmagne, all of these aspects shape how individual women develop and how others relate to them.

In addition, she said the power dynamics and cultural representations differ according to women's race, class, culture, and historical location. Joffe-Falmagne said that to talk about psychology of women only makes sense if we incorporate the societal processes that affect women, and

■ Dept. revised in recent years

By M. Isabel Teresa
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Professor Leila Ahmed holds the philosophy of personal sharing with students that she has "no hard and fast rules for sharing of herself with her students; depends on the moment and teaching situation."

Ahmed is the director of the Women's Studies Program at UMass.

"How much a professor shares with his/her students is not a question that is different for women's studies students as compared to other courses," said Ahmed. "Women's studies is about thought and research, just as in other courses."

Ahmed credits the women's studies faculty at UMass as being very committed to women's issues, integrating diverse feminist perspectives of women's history, their place in society, and issues of gender within society.

The women's studies program has been evolving, and has seen major changes since its inception in 1974. Two years ago the core curriculum was completely redesigned. The program initially did not address issues of race and class in the curriculum.

The current curriculum reflects the rethinking and redesigning that took place, recognizing the centrality of race and class to women's issues.

One of the changes that resulted from the new curriculum is that women's studies majors need to take two women of color courses to fulfill the department's requirements.

Ahmed feels the interdisciplinary approach to teaching women's studies is very positive because the students are introduced to a variety of perspectives from different areas and disciplines. Ahmed also said that she would like to see the department expand because more faculty is needed, but the main issue is the lack of funds available.

Ahmed's vision of the Women's Studies department for the next 20 years includes greater expansion of women's studies as a critical part of the University.

She said she would like to see issues of gender addressed throughout courses offered at UMass, as well as the development of other cultures within societies. Ahmed would also like to see expansion upon the study of women of color.

Regarding criticisms of women's studies programs, Ahmed stated that the history of the feminist movement has had a lot of opposition. She added that there is a difference between knowledge and distortion of facts, and that there are difficulties when something is unknown or assumed, which leads to the formation of stereotypes.

Ahmed also said that one needs to be critically aware of the prejudices and racism sometimes found in women's studies. She also said that students should be wary of women

Kwanzaa holiday is chance to remember African heritage

By G.L. Wallace and Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

'Tis is the season to celebrate a grand and rich heritage, that of Africa and her world citizens.

Last Sunday, over 100 Black students and faculty gathered at the Malcolm X Center for a Kwanzaa fete featuring a live jazz ensemble, as well as a plethora of cultural food and drink items; as the turnout suggests, Kwanzaa is alive and well on campus.

The genesis of Kwanzaa dates back to 1966, when activist and scholar Dr. Maulana Karenga sought to create a celebration that would meld the traditions of Continental Africa with the political needs and sensibilities of the African-American diaspora. Karenga's work, "The African-American Holiday of Kwanzaa," expands on his concept.

Kwanzaa, celebrated from Dec. 26 to Jan. 1 by people of African descent world wide, is a Kiswahili word meaning "first fruit of the harvest." It is rooted in the Nguzo Saba (The Seven Sacred Principles) that encourage the development and cohesiveness of the collective. Throughout each of the seven days, a different principle is stressed.

These principles, ordered by day, are: The central theme, Umoja (unity); Kujichaguila (self determination); Ujima (collective work & responsibility); Ujamaa (cooperative economics); Nia (purpose); Kuumba (creativity); and, Imani (faith).

The celebration of Kwanzaa includes ceremony and rituals which are learned in order to further understand the philosophy of Kawaida, which, among other things stresses value as a building block and tradition and reason as the loci of any action.

"Kwanzaa is an attempt to build a sense of community in a holistic fashion, which is inherent in us anyway," CCEBMS counselor Sean Warner said. "So, in essence it's a way of getting back to the way we were."

However, Warner did offer this criticism. "The problem is that it's basically reactive with respect to the European holiday, Christmas," Warner said. "Essentially, why do Black folks want to do what the dominant culture does?"

Student Trustee Al Lizana spoke of Kwanzaa as "a blueprint for the upliftment of the Black community."

"People consider Kwanzaa a holiday, but maybe it should be a holi-everyday," Lizana said.

According to Karenga, Kwanzaa is the reaction to "a people's choice to allow an oppressor to educate their children have also limited their human possibilities. And a people whose paradigms of thought and practice are borrowed from its oppressor clearly have limited possibilities."

African National Congress is set to return to its roots at convention

By Donna Bryson
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The African National Congress is returning to its roots at the first convention since transforming from guerrilla group to government.

President Nelson Mandela will strive to reassure the nation's restive Black majority that they have not been forgotten in the seven months since the ANC swept South Africa's first all-race election.

Mandela set the tone in the weeks leading up to this weekend's meeting, touring bleak, seemingly hopeless shack settlements.

"It is necessary for a leader to know what the people are thinking, and you can only acquire this knowledge by going and talking to them in their shacks and sitting down exchanging views with them," Mandela told the Associated Press. "It is only in that way that you are able to keep in touch with the grassroots."

The first ANC national conference since 1991 begins Saturday in Bloemfontein, the same Orange Free State agricultural capital where the organization was founded in 1912.

"We always remember our ancestors," said Ike Maphoto, one of the hundreds of ANC delegates from all over the country streaming to Bloemfontein. "We had a meeting there in 1912 — our founding meeting. But we were not free. Today we are free, and we're going to speak freely."

Maphoto joined the ANC in 1952 and went from political prisoner to top aide to the premier of the Northern Transvaal, a rural province along South Africa's border with Zimbabwe.

He said he would represent the isolated, tradition-bound people of his province at the conference. But he also had larger concerns. "We must talk about how to rule," he said. "Fighting a liberation struggle and ruling are two different things." The ANC campaigned on the slogan "a better life for all," promising houses and jobs for impoverished Blacks whose needs were neglected by White minority governments under apartheid.

Rumblings of impatience are everywhere. Homeless Blacks have taken matters into their own hands, occupying empty apartment buildings in downtown Johannesburg and vacant fields in the countryside. Angry, disappointed jobseekers picket at factory gates.

"Our people have suffered for decades and even centuries," Mandela said Tuesday. "Their suffering tends to make them feel that we are moving slowly."

The discontent has a racial tone in a country where race has always meant so much. Callers to talk radio shows and writers to newspapers complain that Mandela's government has spent too much time reassuring Whites and not enough time devoting its energies to the Black majority.

Mandela has cautioned Blacks to stop protests and strikes because they could scare off White investors, and repeatedly called for reconciliation.

"We are deploying no men, we are paying no money to send this message that Whites should not fear the future," Mandela said. "The government of the ANC is serving the interests of all South Africans."

At the upcoming conference, the ANC will point to its accomplishments so far in an attempt to reassure South Africans that they have reason to hope.

Pregnant women and children can get free medical care, and poor students can get meals at their schools under government programs. A new law could mean restitution for South Africans stripped of land and homes by apartheid, and there are plans for a first year of free education for South African children who in the past had to pay for all of their schooling.

Work has begun on new homes and water projects in rural areas, part of the government's $22.5 billion program to improve living standards in the next five years.

"This government has done far more than expected within seven months of taking office," Mandela said. "We are building an infrastructure and delivering services already."

Maphoto has faith in the organization he joined as a 21-year-old student.

"Had there been no ANC, I don't think we would be where we are today."

Market Reports

Dollar makes gains in slow trading day

NEW YORK (AP) — The Mexican peso fell to a record low against the dollar Thursday as concerns about the Chiapas rebellion weakened financial markets and Mexicans bought the U.S. currency for Christmas travel and shopping.

Against most major currencies, the dollar rose slightly in thin trading. Market participants said diminished hopes for an increase in short-term U.S. interest rates when Federal Reserve policymakers meet next Tuesday slowed the currency's advance, but they stressed that a lack of fresh economic data gave little impetus to make new bets in either direction on the dollar.

Elsewhere, the Australian dollar hit a three-year high of 77 93 U.S. cents, a day after the country's central bank, the Reserve Board of Australia, boosted its official short-term rate a full percentage point to 7.5 percent.

Higher rates tend to strengthen a country's currency by increasing returns on short-term deposits and assets, making them more attractive to investors.

Crops rebound well after down time

CHICAGO (AP) — Wheat futures prices recovered strongly Thursday from two days of steep losses on the Chicago Board of Trade. Soybean futures also advanced while corn and oat futures ended narrowly mixed.

Wheat's plunge of nearly 12 cents a bushel Tuesday and Wednesday left the market oversold and ripe for a rebound, analysts said. Prices also were supported by revived hopes for sales of U.S. wheat to China at these lower prices, according to Steve Freed, research director for ADM Investor Services Inc. in Chicago. Soybeans recovered from two days of losses in response to a monthly National Oilseed Processors Association report showing a large amount of soybeans crushed last month for meal and oil. Gains were limited by selling linked to lower Malaysian palm oil prices overseas.

Wheat for March delivery rose 3 1/2 cents to $3.86 a bushel; March corn fell 1/4 cent to $2.27 3/4 a bushel; March oats rose 1 and 1/2 cents to $1.22 1/4 a bushel; January soybeans rose 1 and 1/2 cents to $5.62 3/4 a bushel.

Stocks make gains during heavy trading

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks posted strong gains, boosted by technical buying and receding worries about higher interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average logged a double-digit advance. On the New York Stock Exchange, advancing issues led decliners by nearly 3 to 2 late in the session. Big Board volume was strong, and broad market indexes moved higher.

Market indexes were pushed higher by several waves of computerized buy programs tied to Friday's double expiration of options and futures. Traders and analysts also said the market was bouncing back from last week's selloff, which took 54 points off the Dow average.

"There's a tremendous amount of program buying," said Jon Groveman, president of Ladenburgh, Thalmann & Co. "You're getting yearend oversold rally, and the expiration is fanning it." Investors were also encouraged that an interest-rate tightening by the Federal Reserve appears less likely next week.

Cadets will take to the skies with new program

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

A new joint program on campus gives Air Force ROTC cadets access to extra flight training.

The Aerospace Studies Department (Air Force ROTC) on campus recently initiated an affiliation with Civil Air Patrol (CAP). This initiative allows eight qualified Air Force ROTC cadets, who become members of CAP, eight hours of flight training with CAP, according to Major Cheryl Koren, unit recruiting officer for the campus Air Force ROTC.

According to Koren, the flights will be similar to CAP's existing cadet orientation program which emphasizes safety first. The CAP orientation pilots are volunteer CAP senior members with a minimum of 500 hours as a pilot in command.

Lieutenant Colonel Stankiewicz, professor of aerospace science at the University, said one of the reasons UMass was chosen for the program was its proximity to the Westover base in Chicopee.

CAP is a 53,000–plus member all–volunteer, non–profit organization. The three main missions of CAP are emergency services, aerospace education and cadet programs. The emergency services missions include search and rescue, civil defense and disaster relief operations, and support of many other organizations.

The aerospace education program encourages the maintenance of air supremacy. It is designed to provide all American citizens with an understanding and an appreciation of the importance of aviation and space exploration to our society and to our national security.

According to Koren, the affiliation is well timed for the Air Force ROTC. Pilot and navigator slots are on the rise this year, and will continue to do so for the next five years. By 1999, Air Force ROTC will have approximately 650 pilot slots and 175 navigator slots, increasing from 126 pilot and 175 navigator slots this year.

"I thought it was a good opportunity," said George Lugo, a junior air transportation major of the University of Connecticut and a cadet 1st lieutenant in the Air Force ROTC. "It's really very interesting. It's a good program."

"It was worth the $15," said Bill Wildman, a junior theater studies major at UConn and Cadet 3rd class in Air Force ROTC, when asked about the CAP membership fee.

"If you fly with a civilian, they can charge you $50–$60 an hour," said Lugo.

"I enjoyed it a lot," said Wildman.

Correction:

The Peer Education Program on sexual harassment will address what men can and cannot do about the issue, but it will not be a focus of the courses. This was unclear in yesterday's front–page story on the program.

Student coordinator Michael Einhorn drew up a proposal that he brought to campus offices. The Residential Academic Program and Housing Services/Residence Life are also providing financial support.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

scholars whose vested interests are determined by the perpetuation of negative feminist stereotypes.

Ahmed stated that there are different methods of activism, and that her activism is most pronounced in her writing and formal speaking.

Ahmed has been with UMass since 1980, and director of Women's Studies since 1992. The Women's Studies Program at UMass was the first developed women's studies program in the five college area, begun in 1974.

In 1981 the Women's Studies department at UMass had its own faculty for the first time. Currently some faculty members are strictly women's studies faculty, not shared with other departments, and other faculty members are crosslisted with another department.

Ahmed's area of expertise is women's history and Arabic and Muslim literature and gender. She will be teaching "Arab and Muslim Fiction and Autobiography: Gender and Narration" in the spring semester.

In addition to teaching women's studies, Ahmed has also taught comparative literature in the Near Eastern Studies Department at UMass.

There is a Five College Women's Studies course packet listing of all the women's studies courses offered to students, majors, minors, and those interested in women's studies, Ahmed said.

Ahmed also encourages students to take courses offered at the other four area colleges, because of the diversity and wealth of expertise of the women's studies faculty. She said that there is a comprehensive booklet available that lists, by department, women's studies faculty and their area of expertise at each of the colleges.

Ahmed said all of this information is available at the Women's Studies office located at 208 Bartlett Hall or call 545–1922 for any other information.

Joffe–Falmagne also teaches a graduate pro–seminar course in women's studies and a graduate course on feminist inquiry in the social sciences at Clark University. The pro– seminar surveys theoretical analyses and empirical research pertaining to the roles of women in societies and cultures.

This incorporates the study of cultural representations of women, as well as women's individual functioning and development in content. It involves the participation of several other women's studies faculties. The course on feminist inquiry in the social sciences covers contemporary topics with feminist theories.

Joffe–Falmagne has been at Clark University for 21 years. Her prior duties have included being the Director of Women's Studies Program at Clark from 1989 to 1993.

All of the undergraduate women's studies courses and some graduate courses at Clark University are cross–listed with another department, only the core graduate courses are not cross–listed.

In 1992 the Women's Studies Ph.D. program at Clark University accepted its first students. The Ph.D. program is freestanding; it grants a Ph.D. in women's studies rather than a certificate or a concentration. Several other universities are in the process of following this model.

Hot tips for cold winter days

By Feg Mitchel
Collegian Staff

With the falling of the snow this past Wednesday, Mother Nature is reminding us of the cold winter months that lie ahead.

For all of us this means becoming aware of some of the risks associated with being outside in the cold, and planning what types of outdoor wear will be both safe and comfortable.

"Human beings are not capable of physiologically adapting to changes in order to protect from cold injury . . . we have no instincts for cold survival," says Richard Strauss, author of the book Sports Medicine.

The temperature regulator, the hypothalamus, directs the body to alter heat production and heat loss in response to cold or heat stress.

Normal body temperature ranges from 37 degrees C (98.6 F) in the mouth to 38.5 degrees C (100 F) deep in the liver, but can fall dangerously below 35 C in a condition called hypothermia.

The Physician and Sportsmedicine magazines say the greatest discomfort from the cold seems to occur in the hands and feet.

In a study on the effects of chilling hands and feet, researchers found that hands can be more quickly rewarmed than feet.

They suggested that once people become chilled, feet remain cold until the entire body is returned to a warm environment and rewarmed.

Hands and feet are two areas on the body which can easily fall prey to frostbite, says Jack Galub of Health magazine.

Superficial frostbite can be treated with body heat such as holding warm hands on the affected area or putting cold hands under the armpits.

The best prevention, according to Health magazine, is wearing wool or woolblend mittens with silk linings for the hands, and wool socks with a cotton layer inside for the feet.

Individuals who spend large amounts of time exercising outdoors need to be especially prepared for the cold.

For runners, cyclists and skiers, in particular, large amounts of body heat are lost by convection as their bodies are moving through the wind, increasing the risk of frostbite.

Other guidelines for protecting exposed skin include wearing a lightweight mask over the nose and mouth, mittens instead of gloves, applying lip balm and suntan lotion and protecting the eyes against sun and dry wind with goggles or sunglasses.

And remember to drink plenty of hot or cold fluids whether or not you're thirsty.

We should also be aware of the potential for hypothermia, a condition where core temperature drops to dangerous levels, sometimes due to prolonged immersion in cold water.

Chronic hypothermia occurs in otherwise healthy individuals, says Strauss.

Factors that predispose one to hypothermia are extremes of age (either very young or very old), serious injury, especially to the head, leanness, wetness due to lack of prospective insulation and high windchill.

James Thornton of the Physician and Sportsmedicine recommends that everyone, especially these who exercise in the cold, adhere to the following guidelines.

First, when outside for long periods of time or when exercising, bring a friend.

Listen to the body's warning signals and be on the lookout for poor judgement, staggering and decreased mental alertness. Don't disregard pain.

Try to stay moderately cool when exercising by layering your clothing first with polypropelene layers which will wisp away perspiration from the skin, followed by an outer shell of Gortex which prevents wind from disturbing inner layers.

Keep the head, hands and feet well covered and make sure there's sufficient air space between your toes. Always stay well hydrated and keep a positive caloric balance.

Christmas crunch time is here again

From CDs to candles, a plethora of gift ideas for the holidays

By Colleen D. Shanahan
Collegian Staff

I'm sure one of the last things on your mind, with less than two weeks before finals, is Christmas gifts. So I have taken the liberty of compiling a short list of what some women want this holiday season.

Now, moms, of course, are the hardest to buy for. Maybe you've heard, "No honey, don't spend your money on me — I don't need anything."

But of course you get her something anyway because who could stand the crumpled look on Mom's face when there's no present under the tree from her own child? We all know we would never be forgiven if we actually took her up on the "no gifts for me," empty plea.

Every year my mom says that all she wants is six weeks in Bermuda with pay. This year I got her a rock — She'll love it.

Here are some thoughts for your mom. The usual perfume gift set from CVS simply will not do. How about a gift certificate for a massage or a manicure? Gourmet coffee? A magazine subscription?

The trick is to think of something she would love to have but would never buy for herself. If you are short of cash, do something nice for her. Here are some thoughts.

Clean the house from top to bottom, or make her dinner and her favorite dessert. Write her a nice letter brimming with how wonderful she is.

On to girlfriends. I surveyed friends and acquaintances, and suggest that those of you who have to buy something for that special woman in your life, read carefully. My friend Alex would like goodies from Victoria Secret and compact discs.

Easy enough. My friend Jill, however, would not only like compact discs, but the CD player to go along with them. And some jewelry and clothes too.

In fact, Victoria Secret paraphernalia seems to be on everyone's wish list. Spending $50 on underwear is reasonable, right?

Some other "I must haves" included L.L. Bean flannels, anything from Yankee Candle, CDs, concoctions from Bath and Body Works (on my sister's list, works great for roommates, too), and books which can be read at one's own leisure with no fear of being tested on the material.

Of course, there were the old standbys: clothes, gift certificates to Strawberries, perfume, new wallets. But why not be creative — the Allman Brothers gave their agent a new motorcycle. Fashion designer Nicole Miller sends her staff on an all–expense paid trip to Disney. Director Quentin Tarantino gives socks.

Christmas comes but once a year, at least make it interesting. Hunting for the special gift you requested makes shopping more fun for the giver because they know you will love it.

Surprisingly enough, no one asked for money, except me. . . but I am awfully greedy. I want a Motorola flip phone (I'd only use it in emergencies), Disney movies, Dr. Seuss books, a C is Statistics 240, Amarige perfume and a new claddagh ring. No, even if I'm a mom someday, you'll never hear me saying, "don't spend your money on me." Happy shopping!

COURTESY CALVIN KLEIN

Perfume is just one of the many gifts you can give to that special someone this holiday season.

In support of the Speaker's Policy

Some critics of the proposed speaker policy for the University of Massachusetts say such a guideline is unnecessary and redundant since it adheres to the First Amendment's protection of speech.

In rejecting endorsement of the proposal Wednesday night, the Student Government Association failed to realize that the reiteration is necessary.

The First Amendment is widely misunderstood — too many people believe it means "free speech, provided it isn't offensive." Such misinterpretation sends angry students to the SGA demanding that certain controversial events not be funded.

The strength of the speakers policy is that it defines the parameters of the First Amendment as it has been defined through court decisions. Offensiveness isn't a reason to restrict speech; obscenity is. Condoning violence isn't restricted; intentionally provoking immediate violence is. And using the free expression argument to prevent someone else from being heard violates the First Amendment.

In essence, the speakers policy is a brief history of the evolution of the First Amendment. It clearly states that this public university cannot and will not pick and choose who will be allowed to speak. Ideally, the policy will shift the public debate away from questioning whether someone should speak and will instead address issues raised by the speech.

As members of an education environment, we should be sharply aware of the need for open expression of ideas. A suppressed idea cannot be held to public scrutiny; only through wide-open debate can we examine its strengths and weaknesses.

Resolutions for the New Year

Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl

Poor Chancellor Scott. He can dish it out, but he can't take it.

While he felt competent to pre-judge Professor Tony Martin as an "anti-Semite" whose ideas should be loathed, the chancellor has demonstrated a profound inability to accept, let alone act on, the mounting criticisms against him.

This is nowhere more obvious than in regard to the transcripts scandal, in which he has still done nothing at all of substance to demonstrate that he does not in effect condone the passing out of Black athletes confidential records.

Instead of doing something to meet the demands of Black students and begin to rectify the situation, Scott has been scurrying around frantically trying to explain away their complaints. For example, in spite of the ample evidence to the contrary printed in the pages of this newspaper a few days ago, he has issued a statement insisting that New Africa House is "safe" and that no one should be concerned about the University's neglect of it.

Also, in the pages of his propaganda organ, the Campus Chronicle, the chancellor has tried to wriggle out of the transcripts scandal by arguing that tracking athletes according to race was necessary to meet NCAA requirements and keep track of diversity and affirmative action policies. Scott here was resorting to his old used-car-salesman trick of "blurring the boundaries," in this case confusing the compilation of broad statistics about overall campus-wide trends, which may be needed, with tracking individual athletes based on race, which is clearly another matter.

To add insult to injury, he openly admitted that "Hell yes," he did have the power to make changes, but he just didn't feel like it. It was extraordinary to see the man who was a decisive flouter of process during the "night of the long knives" sackings of Conti, Gordon and Melley last semester, pleading for understanding that his hands were tied by process and red-tape when it came to the needs of Black students.

As far as his boss President Hooker is concerned, things can only have been going downhill since the humiliating "C+" grade, given that the president has recently shot Scott's Div. 1A football dreams down in public. Scott looked like nothing at all and chancellor of nowhere.

Scott's only answer to these mounting problems for his administration has been to swagger around campus and try to intimidate his critics and demand "respect."

Perhaps this is the chancellor's idea of "free speech."

If the chancellor continues to behave in the manner of a sleazy politician rather than a serious administrator, then he may soon end up at the College of Piping and Celtic Performing Arts in Somerside, Prince Edwards Island, which, according to the Wall Street Journal is currently looking for senior staff.

To prevent this, here are some New Year's Resolutions for the chancellor to cut out and clip, recite daily during the break, and tape to his refrigerator door.

- I will not collaborate in publicizing Black students' transcripts.
- I will ban Brad Smith from campus.
- I will read a book by Tony Martin before condemning him.
- I will not bully student newspapers.
- I will adhere to established process when firing my enemies.
- I will repair the New Africa House.
- I will get a new haircut.
- I will not form secret committees.
- I will get grades better than C+.
- I will keep my appointments.
- I will join Antiques Anonymous.
- I will clean my own house.
- I will work on my sense of humor.

Society needs more religion

Mark McGrath

The main problem with society today is the decline of religion's role in our lives. Many people complain about the way things are going. There's too much crime. There's too much poverty. Kids these days have no respect. The solution is a simple one. Bring religion back into society.

Religion is hard to define. There are thousands of different religions, and each and every one is unique and comes with its own ideals as to how we should live our lives. Many people claim that they're not religious because they don't go to services on a regular basis.

People see practicing religion as a chore. They are too busy satisfying their physical and social needs, and don't feel they have the time to practice religion. I believe that religion isn't about spending time going to these services. It's about living life with religious ideals.

A man who goes to a religious service each week and says a few prayers doesn't have religion. He has a habit. Practicing religion makes many people feel like they're doing something worthwhile. If that very same man, on his way to church drops some money in a charity box or helps someone with car trouble, he not only has a habit, but also practices that habit in everyday life. That is religion.

Religion in general helps to create an ideal behavior. It doesn't really matter which religion you choose, or whether you go all out or not. You could be a Christian, Muslim, Jew, Buddhist or any other religion for that matter. All come with an ideal code of conduct. Religion adds structure to lives where there could easily be none.

Religion helps us to avoid many common pitfalls in the world today. People in our society have grown to worship many different gods. Money, of course is the high god. Power and fame aren't far behind. These things provide goals, but they aren't the right goals. They are worldly things, things which make you feel good, but only for awhile. The ideals I'm talking about are lasting. Who do you know who doesn't feel good about helping someone, making someone laugh or teaching something? No matter how often this happens, it never loses its effect.

Which is better, the feeling you get when you do a good deed, or the feeling you get when you find five dollars? The money can get you a sub and drink, but a good deed can leave you glowing for hours. You can't find money at will, but there is always someone, somewhere who can use some help. String a series of these good deeds together, and you'll have lived a great life, and a happy one, too.

Many children today grow up in households where religion doesn't play a role. These children grow up looking at their parents. If a parent doesn't teach or live by some type of religious ideals, he/she isn't doing their job. Their child won't learn the correct way to act. The learning process will be conducted on the streets, where gangs and drugs are the most notable teachers. Bringing up children with some sense of religious ideals will at least give them ideas as to how they should act. No mainstream religion advocates the use of violence or encourages crime. Religious ideals are in general, are a positive force in society.

In a society which is spiraling downward at an alarming rate, religion could be the factor which improves our lives to the point where we can be content once again. Religion, although separated from the state by law, is one of the threads which has held the very fabric of our society together for the past 200 years. Now that the thread is coming loose, all of society is falling apart.

We, as Americans, have the privilege of choosing our religion. Choosing can be difficult. Naturally, people will be uncomfortable with the idea of jumping into a whole new world because it's something they haven't done before, or it has been awhile since they have.

Each religion has its own unique set of elements. If no single one appeals to you, try creating one of your own. Adopt a multiple religious identity which incorporates your favorite aspects of several different religions. There are no rules, except for the ones you choose to abide by. The important thing is to educate yourself. Do what comes naturally. Once you've found something you like, stick to it. Let it affect the way you act. Religion in any form is a positive for society, and with everyone practicing something, this country can be an ideal place to live.

Treating Amherst like the town in 'Footloose'

"What is this, like the 'Footloose' town or something?" —Jon Stewart, spring 1994, UMass Fine Arts Center.

Caleb Cochran

When comedian Jon Stewart joked about the oppressive nature of the town of Amherst in his performance last spring, I laughed heartily. Today, after the announcement that the Amherst Police Department has asked Antonio's Pizza to close at 1 a.m. effective Jan. 1, 1995, I fear he might have been on to something.

What's next? Closing the bars at 9 p.m. so the cops can play cards at Dunkin' Donuts at 9:30? It's ridiculous enough that the bars in Amherst close at 1 a.m.

Go to virtually any college town in the nation and tell people that your bars close at one — then prepare to be laughed at.

This is a college town, contrary to what the police and some of the life-long residents want to tell themselves. My message to these people is this: If you want to live in a quaint little New England town that goes to bed early, try Belchertown. I've driven through it, and it seems really nice. But don't try and take this town away from the students.

According to the Collegian article on the decision to close Antonio's early, "Officer Charles Sherpa of the Amherst Police Department said it was difficult to control the crowds that flowed into the streets from in front of Antonio's."

Boo-hoo. It's tough being an Amherst cop, I know. All those vandals trying to break into the Emily Dickinson estate must keep them awake at nights. But to close down Antonio's because the police department actually has to work for a living two nights a week is a poor excuse.

And I've got news for you, Officer Sherpa. Closing Antonio's at 1 a.m. isn't going to get rid of the crowds that are going to pour out of the bars and hang out on North Pleasant Street. The only difference is that we won't be eating pizza while standing there — we'll probably be eating hot dogs.

Antonio's is the only late night pleasure available to the students of the Amherst community. After a night of boozing at any or all of the local watering holes, there is no better way to end the night than with a steaming slice of $1 cheese pie. Is it crowded? You bet. Does the crowd flow onto the edge of the street? Occasionally. Does this pose a problem to anyone's safety, health, or general well-being? Absolutely not.

I have yet to see anyone get run over in front of Antonio's. If the cops want to take credit for this, fine. But the fact is that although we are just a bunch of stupid UMass kids, we're generally smart enough to restrain ourselves from running through the street into oncoming traffic.

What all of this comes down to is that the police don't want to deal with college students who are out on weekends acting like (gulp) college students. That's right, we drink beer, we stay up late, and we like to eat pizza. Have you ever seen a stabbing, shooting or mugging outside of Antonio's? I haven't. Some bad pick-up lines, yes. But real crime? Never. We're eating pizza, for God's sake. We're not hurting anyone. It's a restaurant, not a crack house.

Just because the sidewalk gets a little crowded for about an hour on weekends is no reason to take away the singular late night privilege that the uptown area provides. What would the police do if the bars closed at two or three like they do in most other college towns? Obviously, we'll never know. The fact is, the police are very lucky that the bars do close at one, and that Antonio's does close at two.

No matter what time everything closes, be it one, two or five, there is going to be a crowd that forms at the end of the night. The only thing that shutting Antonio's down at one will do is take away the pizza factor. The crowds will remain.

Despite the attempts of the police, Amherst will not become another Footloose town. Kevin Bacon has left the building.

Spending a night homeless by an accident of chance

Justin Doyle

"Do you have any change," he asked humbly.

I walked up and down the pier waiting. The cold wind blew through my winter coat and kept my head down as I tried to block my face. Wally a.k.a. the wolf crept up to me in his raggedy clothes, bare hands and an unruly beard which looked as though it hadn't been shaved in months.

"You got a cigarette or a dollar," Wally said.

"Listen man, I'm in your place," I said.

Wally looked at me like "oh, he must be a runaway." It was sad. Here I was drunk, cold and tired. Miles away from any place to sleep next to a homeless shelter. My ATM card wasn't working and I was without a ride home. All this for a basketball game. Later a friend said I must be the biggest UMass fan. I told her I didn't choose to be homeless for a night, it just happened.

And that is exactly what Wally told me, and what Erik said in not so many words and what Brian related to me. No one asks to be homeless. They didn't wake up one day without a house or home, but nevertheless it happened.

Each homeless person I met told me a different tale of how their "old lady" kicked them out of the house or how they lost their job one way or another.

"Are you trying to get a job," I asked Wally.

"Yeah, I have a job set up for next week," he said.

It seemed hard to believe. It is easy to turn away as homeless people ask for handouts. You ignore them with disgust, make rude comments and tell them to leave you alone. These people walk the streets everyday not knowing what their next meal is coming from or where they are sleeping tonight. And they are treated as if they are less than human.

As I watched Wally help people park on the pier hoping that someone might offer some change, I started to open my eyes. He was not a drug addict looking for some money to get a fix, or a hoodlum waiting by the ATM to rob you blind. Wally, like most of the homeless people I met, was an ordinary average guy, who had run into a bad stretch of luck.

Reaching into my empty pockets, I suddenly knew how he felt.

At first I was afraid. Soon I became angry.

As I leaned up against a building, I watched another homeless person named Erik walk up and down the streets with a petition, asking for money. People piled into the bars, filling themselves with overpriced alcohol, running in and out of the cold night, paying little attention to Erik.

One unruly drunk, not wanting to be bothered, grabbed Erik by his thin coat and slammed him against a wall. The drunk, who was the size of a small linebacker, was out of control. He screamed at Erik, throwing him repeatedly against the wall. Something compelled me to step in.

Later that evening I met yet another homeless person by the name of Brian. Despite constantly asking me for money and nearly turning me into the police, for what I don't know, he pointed me toward the hotels in downtown Baltimore. Brian even gave me a number and told me to call him to make sure I was all right. I laughed. A homeless person with a phone number.

At least I found somewhere to stay. I don't know what happened to Wally, Erik or Brian, but that's just life.

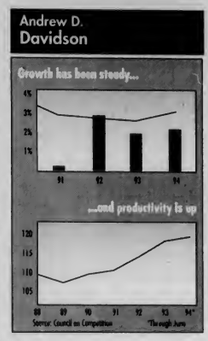
How to keep the recovery going

Andrew D. Davidson



Despite what some signs show, the economy is experiencing sustainable growth which it has not seen since the early 1960s. Growth has been strong, while inflation has remained under control (see graph).

Both the Fed and the Congress have a historic opportunity to sustain the current steady expansion. But to do so, they must both break from traditional conventions which are proving obsolete in today's economic order and re-examine the policies which they have both traditionally followed.

The Fed's influence over the money market is beginning to dissipate just as they're tightening their grip on credit. Private banks hold less than 35 percent of their assets in U.S. government-issued debt (down from 57 percent in 1983), causing rate hikes to have less of an effect on the overall structure of interest rates.

Which means that rates are more likely to go up at the next meeting of the Fed's Board of Governors on Dec. 20. This is unfortunate, since the recently revised third-quarter economic data shows inflationary pressures aren't as worrisome as some indicate. Despite the dip in unemployment to 5.6 percent in November and the 0.7 percent rise in average hourly earnings in October, increased productivity has offset the rise in wages, providing further evidence that the labor market is far from full employment. Output per worker in the non-farm sector grew at a 2.7 percent annual rate in the third quarter, while unit labor costs rose a scant 0.1 percent, up only 0.9 percent in the past year.

Productivity growth is on a five-year upswing, and looks like it will continue to grow if business isn't discouraged from investing (see graph). Improved economic positions of most firms will make them available to use retained earnings for investments as opposed to issuing bonds or borrowing.

But real growth is not driven by big corporations who can issue long-term bonds, but by start-up businesses and entrepreneurs, who both require cheap capital to foster growth. And the Fed's typical action is to choke off that outlet for businesses by increasing rates too quickly. "The Fed has a tendency to tighten rates until there is a recession," said David Levy, director of forecasting at the Jerome Levy Economic Institute.

So what should the Fed do next? Wait about six months, and then announce a small cut in short-term rates to coincide with the new construction season, which has been slipping ever since the Fed began increasing rate on Feb. 4. It would also provide an excellent opportunity for business to get one more opportunity to invest cheap, which would prevent the labor market from tightening by increasing capacity.

Let's also hope that Newt Gingrich learns from the lessons of Supply Side past and doesn't erroneously assume, as Reagan did, that cutting taxes would automatically induce Americans to save their money. Given the choice between investing in a steel plant and buying an new VCR, it's obvious what most consumers would do with a larger tax refund.

While a tax cut seems politically appealing, giving the consumer (who only saves 5 percent of their income, on the average) more cash to chase the same amount of goods would only produce inflationary pressures, creating a policy conflicting with the Fed's ultimate goal. However, tax- credits equal to the size of the proposed cut in taxes would be better for both the individual and the economy. First, tax- credits would help improve the long-term financial stability of the consumer by giving them an opportunity to hold more savings. Second, by increasing the supply of capital, the price of borrowing it (the interest rate) falls. Third, it adds to a pool of capital which has been depleted by the increasing government debt.

The ultimate goal of both congressional and Fed policy should be to ensure sustainable growth. This can be done if both institutions follow the proper course. The administration is opening up free trade channels faster than any president this century, creating thousands of export-driven jobs. It is now up to the Fed to adopt a monetary policy and Congress to adopt a tax policy that will further ensure the health of the current expansion.

Lockout reaches 76th day, no agreement in sight

By Ken Rappoport
Associated Press

NEW YORK — With NHL commissioner Gary Bettman and union boss Bob Goodenow on the sidelines for the time being, the spotlight in the league's labor dispute has shifted to a smaller arena.

For the second straight day, lawyers for both sides met Thursday in an attempt to find a common ground so the main negotiators can continue bargaining.

As of Thursday afternoon, Bettman and Goodenow had not been in communication and no talks were scheduled.

Meanwhile the owners lockout reached its 76th day with time quickly evaporating to save the season.

At a public forum Wednesday night in New York with commissioners Paul Tagliabue of the NFL and David Stern of the NBA, Bettman reiterated there was no reason to continue bargaining talks "until there is a genuine willingness to get together and solve (the labor) problems."

Bettman has been empowered to cancel the season unless a new collective bargaining agreement can be reached ensuring a 50-game schedule and full playoffs before July 1.

"You always feel a great sense of responsibility to the game and the fans," Bettman said. "We're comfortable with making difficult decisions. The media and the fans have to understand the full ramifications."

Bettman called the work stoppages in both hockey and baseball "a shaking-out period."

"We're trying to come up with a sensible way to distribute the pie," Bettman said. "We're unique because we have eight franchises in Canada. We are trying to make sure they will all be competitive."

Asked if he thought the NHL missed a big opportunity to cash in on the void left in October by the baseball strike, Bettman said: "Until we have a CBA that treats both owners and players fairly, we don't have a future and there's nothing to capitalize on."

Civic Center Jan. 19: The Rams upset the Minutemen at the Civic Center two years ago, but this URI squad is a far cry from the 1992-93 squad. With the exception of freshman Tyson Wheeler, the Rams' talent is limited, making it potentially a long night for Coach Al Skinner against the talented Minutemen.

Temple Jan. 21: While Temple's talent level is not as strong as it has been in year's past, the rivalry between the Minutemen and the Owls is still one of the best.

Even without NBA draft picks Eddie Jones and Aaron McKie, Temple can still play tough defense. The addition of Huey Futch, a Prop. 48 casualty last year, and two talented freshman to go along with senior point guard Rick Brunson will make Temple competitive.

At Duquesne Jan 24: While the backcourt of Tom Pipkins and Kenya Hunter is a formidable one, without Derrick Alston, a second-round NBA draft pick, the Dukes will have trouble containing Roe, Camby and the rest of the Massachusetts frontcourt.

At West Virginia Jan 27: See above.

Misty Eyed Memories

time, it was the Razorbacks who were out of their league.

I had two great memories of the semester past. The first had to be going down to Hartford, Conn. to take photos of the women's soccer game between UMass and Hartford in the NCAAs. It was the first time I had taken photos for a game and it was pretty exciting. The best part about it was that some of the photos actually came out okay, especially the one of Reiss playing hacky-sack with the four little girls.

The ride down to Storrs, Conn., with the Reiss-Man to see UMass play UConn was another great time. Trying to convince Butch the pumpkin man that 2+2 really doesn't equal 6 and going to Bagel One to find no bagels was especially memorable.

Worst memory: Besides bruising my foot in a friendly midnight game of hoops with my floormate Seth, which reduced me to crutches for two days, my performance at the first annual Candice Flemming Tip-off Classic had to be the worst.

All week I talked trash about how my Candice layhawks were going to destroy Anthony Guido's Sunderland Secondmen.

Not only did my team lose by two, but I was held to just two points on the afternoon, the worst showing of my life. Surely, the second annual tip-off classic will give me a chance to redeem myself.

Look for 23 points next time around, Ant.

Art Stapleton

I could not wait until Dec. 9 for our two-day trip to Baltimore for the Massachusetts–Maryland rematch. The mini-van, Matty V. getting me sick and interviewing the beggar, Bryce eating the Enerjets, BP searching for Camden Yards when he was behind the wheel, AG praying for Nikki Dial's return while getting a hug from Dicky V. and Bilodeau screaming at us when we wanted to give a waitress a $25 tip.

I wanted to come home with three things from the Nickel City — my life, a Baltimore Skipjacks hat, and a UMass victory. As Eddie Vedder would say, I'm still alive, mainly because Bryce didn't drive. I didn't get the hat because, little did I know, the Skipjacks don't exist anymore.

And as for the Terrapins, that taste from Wichita is gone.

Andrew Bryce

Y'all beat me to it. The 104–80 Arkansas win was unbe- freaking-lievable, as evident by the joyous tears rolling down Perillo's cheeks, the 313-yard day by Rene Ingoglia (hey ESPN, the pronunciation of his name is located in your own UMass football media guide) was just amazing.

Talking to Dick Vitale at a Massachusetts basketball practice a month ago for about a half-hour was cool, but he didn't give me a station identification for the radio station I work at.

The Maryland trip was the balls, yet no one mentions how Bilodeau and I snagged angel-hair pasta from the ABC buffet before the Baltimore Arena walkie-talkie-holding patrolmen got a hold of us.

There was also stalking former UNLV coach Jerry Tarkanian while hunched behind a car in the middle of the Mullins Center parking lot, before breaking towards him, knocking on the window of his car, and getting in three questions — I never thought an attempt to talk to Tark would turn me into a defensive back.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, take a look at the final mushy memory by my ever-reliable, NHL hockey-missing, full-bearded co-sports editor, good ol' Matty V. I bet he, in some way, mentions the field hockey team. . .

Nothing makes me more misty-eyed than remembering when there was a Major League of players that actually spent their summers playing our national pastime and my favorite sport.
Brian Perillo

Matt Vautour

It's hard not to pick UMass beating the snot out of Arkansas, but for me the most memorable sporting event of the semester came in early fall, when the University of Massachusetts field hockey team toppled the No. 1 North Carolina Tar Heels.

Top players step it up in big games and two of UMass' top players came through. Hilary Rose turned back a penalty stroke by one of the top forwards in the nation late in the game.

6:14 seconds into overtime Kyle "Big Game" Rothenberger beat UNC goalie Iana Withrow to give the Minutewomen the upset that shocked everyone but themselves.

Thanks Bryce for being the ideal co-sports editor.

Editors' Notes: Good luck to Collegian self-proclaimed expert on everything, and winner of the unofficial "Longest Last Name Award", Derek Milojevic, who is (might be) graduating this semester. We agree! That is why the Annex and the Campus Center Commission have instituted a campaign to get faculty to order their books for next semester now. If faculty submit their order before the buyback starts the Annex can pay 50% of the price of a new copy for books that we need for the spring. If we don't need the book a wholesale company will pay you their price. Since they re-sell those books nationally, the price will always be less than the Annex pays.

"I can't sell it at the Annex unless I bought it there."

Many people think that unless they purchased the book at the Annex they can not sell it back there. Not true! We will buy any book that has wholesale value.

Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson

ARE THERE ANY MONSTERS UNDER MY BED TONIGHT?
OF COURSE NOT. COME UNDER AND SEE FOR YOURSELF
YEAH, COME AND SEE. HEH HEH HEH
OH RIGHT. YOU THINK I'M FALLING FOR THAT?! WHO AM I, TALKING TO IF THERE AREN'T ANY MONSTERS DOWN THERE?!
UHHH... UH...
THEY'RE ALL TEETH AND DIGESTIVE TRACT. NO BRAINS AT ALL.
HAH, WE'RE DUST BALLS!
YEAH, LITTLE DUST BALLS!

Jim's Journal By Jim

Today at the copy store I was working with Erma.
Somebody came in and made some self-serve copies.
He came to the counter and said that none of his copies turned out any good.
Erma asked me what our policy is on that and I said we usually just give out the copies for free.

Your Horoscope

By Art Stapleton

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Jot down clever ideas, even if it is on a napkin, toilet paper or a matchbook cover. Even if you do not use them now, they could come in handy later. Do not eat holiday goodies made by a Pisces.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Someone special makes you feel attractive (no matter what), though, don't believe anything Scots & Ties who truly knows the shape of the Inside Can be an Aquarius instead.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You may have to divert some funds from one project to another. Be careful with whom you split — you may get in a lot of trouble for taking that money from the safe. Extend your sphere of influence by mingling people in positive ways. Don't let them see you cheat.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your enthusiasm is a big plus, but sometimes you go a little overboard. Don't hog out of your cen and celebrate when you catch two consecutive green lights. Be kind to people that have been nice to you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Make advances toward a fautou tiddley, commenting on how attractive that person is. Turn on the charm and you will be pleased with the results.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Turn your back on selfish interests and focus on humanitarian concerns. You may be right if you think someone may be taking you. Help a Sagittarius with a minor problem. Don't take "no" for an answer.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Avoid nothing through work assignments. Take your time. Even though the work is due, you will not be penalized for being late. Look forward to a sizable increase.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You often luck further ahead than your peers. Others are counting on your leadership. Don't cannot an urge to be extravagant & shopping for holiday gifts! Man out your credit cards, or even better, borrow the money.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Confess your shortcomings to someone you trust. Breaking up with the one you love is never easy, but you can lighten the load. Keep the lines of communication open until the results are known.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be upfront about everything you do today. Game playing could destroy an important link between you and an authority figure. Romance sizzles in a steamy bathroom. Lock the door and don't let anyone in.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Do not get back together with your ex-mate. Breaking up was the best thing you ever did. Keep the lines of communication open until Square Dancing. Keep the lines open with your ex-always. On at least until next semester.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Stretching the old budget will not be easy, but do it anyway. Enjoy yourself at the expense of your co-workers. Homemade holiday goodies are always a hit with a friend who is an Aries.

Massachusetts to take on Western Kentucky

Minutemen battle the Hilltoppers tomorrow afternoon at Mullins

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The No. 5 University of Massachusetts men's basketball team hopes to head into winter break on a positive note when it takes on the Western Kentucky Hilltoppers tomorrow night at the William D. Mullins Center.

The Hilltoppers enter the game with a record of 2-1. They defeated Belmont and Ball State, but fell to Jacksonville, a team that includes former Massachusetts three-point threat Jerome Malloy, 100-88 in double overtime.

Western Kentucky returns five starters, led by 6-foot-5- inch forward Chris Robinson, who is averaging 16.7 points per game.

This is Western Kentucky's first year under new head coach Matt Kilcullen. The Hilltoppers made it to the NCAA tournament a year ago, under then-Coach Ralph Willard, before being eliminated by Texas in the tournament's first round. Kilcullen said that the team has not had much trouble adjusting. He says he is, however, concerned about playing Massachusetts.

"We're facing a big test," Kilcullen said. "They have a lot of weapons. You try to take one weapon away and they beat you with another. That's why they're ranked No. 5.

"We have experienced guys who have been in big situations before. We've played fairly well on the road. We're looking forward to it. We think it's going to be a great game. This is a game to see what we're made of."

Minuteman Coach John Calipari expects a tough game from the Hilltoppers.

"They're like Arkansas and Maryland in how they play," Calipari said. "They run, they press, they shoot threes. They are a very good team."

The Minutemen enter the game with the nation's second longest on-campus home winning streak. The have won 36 games in a row at home including a 21-0 record at the Mullins Center. The last time the Minutemen lost on campus was a 76-75 loss to West Virginia on Jan. 8, 1992. The streak is a point of pride with the Minutemen and something they use as motivation.

"We haven't lost in the Mullins Center," said sophomore All-America candidate Marcus Camby. "We just want to keep that streak alive."

Following the Western Kentucky game, the Minutemen have nine days off before traveling to France to play in the Buckler Christmas Challenge in Strausburg, France. The Minutemen will take on teams from France, Portugal and Spain.

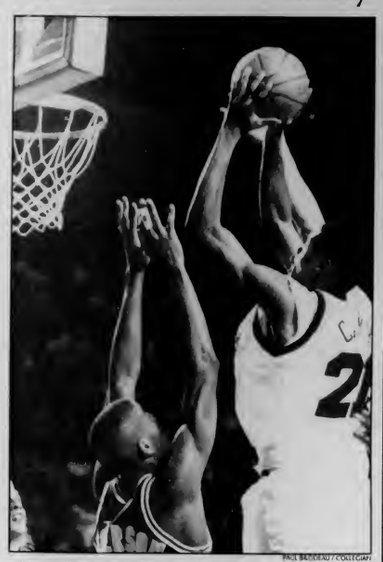
West Virginia in the Abdow's Classic Jan 3: This will be the Mountaineers final trip to this area (Springfield Civic Center) as a member of the Atlantic 10. This game also marks a change in the Abdow's Classic. What once was a four team tournament is now a one game exhibition.

Gene Catlett's squad is a shadow of what his teams have been in years past, with six players from last year's disappointing squad departing.

At St. Louis in the Atlantic 10-Great Midwest Challenge Jan 5: St. Louis was one of the nation's surprise teams a year ago, starting the season 19-1, en route to their first NCAA Tournament since 1957. Led by bomber Erwin Claggett, the conference's all-time leading scorer, the Billikens were a game away from playing the Minutemen in last year's NCAA tournament but were defeated by Maryland.

LaSalle at Atlantic City, NJ. Jan 7: This is the homecoming game for Atlantic City native Lou Roe. All five starters return of the Explorers, led by Kareem Townes (22.9 points per game.)

At St. Bonaventure Jan 10: Without all-everything player Harry Moore, the Mustard and Brown will need strong performances from crowd favorite Jeff Quakenbush, Nii Nelson-Richards, David Vanterpool and Shandue McNeil to have any chance against UMass.



PAUL BRODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Marcus Camby and the Minutemen will be looking to slam the Hilltoppers of Western Kentucky tomorrow at 4 p.m. in the Mullins Center

Rutgers Jan 12: Bob Wenzel's squad hopes to have a big year in its final year in the Atlantic 10 before the Scarlet Knights and West Virginia head to the Big East. Rutgers will need big games from Andrew Koblsovsky and Jamal Phillips, if it hopes to break its drought against the Minutemen.

Pennsylvania Jan. 14: The Ivy League and top level college basketball are seldom spoken about together. The Quakers have set their sights on a run in the NCAA tournament.

UPenn made a strong statement Tuesday night when they upset Michigan 62-60. The backcourt of Jerome Allen and Matt Maloney lead a talented UPenn squad that should give the Minutemen a challenge.

Misty-eyed memories from the semester gone by

It has become a tradition. It is enjoyable and necessary for the Collegian sports staff to express our views on the wonderful world of sports. It may be pathetic and unnecessary to you faithful readers, but some of the thoughts may guide you down memory lane, and you may get a kick out of the others. It is the Collegian Sports' own Misty-Eyed Memories of the 1994 fall semester.

Steven Grant

It was getting pretty lonely on that band-wagon. But thanks to that amazing second half against the Vikings, the Patriots are in the playoff hunt. Too bad the Super Bowl isn't until next semester.

Mike Reiss

When Boston Herald columnist and UMass grad Gerry Callahan accepted a new position at Sports Illustrated earlier in the semester, one point in his farewell column hit me pretty hard. He wrote of Chris Sullivan, a young boy who was an avid Boston College fan, and was dying of a rare form of cancer.

"Sometimes we get the lines crossed up," wrote Callahan as he compared Sullivan's disease to the resource of sport.

Just a few weeks ago, I had the opportunity to visit the Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children with a large group of student-athletes from UMass. In the playroom at the hospital I saw a lot of courage, a courage that just couldn't be compared to taking a last second shot with a game on the line.

This is not to discount sport at all, but life is a gift to treasure and sport is just a part of that. And I'm probably guilty of getting the lines crossed up more than anyone.

Leigh Torbin

Someday when I reflect on a first semester that was anything but "an unmitigated disaster of nearly apocalyptic proportions," many things will stand out. I'll be sitting at Mike's, watching Drew Bledsoe lead the Patsies to victory in Super Bowl XXXII, and I'll mentally head back to where it all began.

I'll think of the little things like Erin Lynch's headband and Candice's compulsion with it, Kilduff's 26-save period, tailgating contests, the night our $43 million arena had no ice, Jorma's gas cap, "Objection! He's leading Mallen," Bryce's hairdo at the Arkansas game and the Nikki Ahrenholz's height chart.

The hockey team will be in the NCAAs, and I'll tell the class of 2001 about the abysmal 0-34-1 season that I survived, and writing a cross country article that included the phrase "deep puncture wound," way back when. . .

Allison Connolly

The memories I have are somewhat shady. I got misty-eyed when the men's water polo team made the NCAA's at Brown U. this season and then threw their favorite coach in the pool with all of his clothes on as a sign of thanks — then when my article on their win got buried on page eight.

However, I'd like to give three beers — I mean cheers — to the Brandywine section of the sports staff (Jamie and Matty V.), for covering the games that really count, like "Kick the Keg," "Larry Shot Olympics," "12 J Balcony Jumping" and, of course, (my favorite) "Coffee Table Dancing."

Jody King

Maybe not the most memorable to all sports fans, my misty-eyed memories include two events, (no, not field hockey and basketball), that UMass teams entered this semester.

PAUL BRODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Massachusetts' win against Arkansas in the Tip-off Classic, led by Lou Roe's career high 34 points, was just one of the Collegian sports staff's misty-eyed memories of the semester past.

The first was the newly instated women's crew team and their entries in the Head of the Charles. Traveling to Cambridge on that cold rainy day to walk up and down the winding, muddy riverbank was not as horrible as it may sound.

In fact, it was an amazing day filled with enthusiasm, spirit and exeitement.

It was a day which embodied every aspect of sport, of competition. I am thankful to have gotten the opportunity to experience the event.

My second misty-eyed memory no doubt goes to the Massachusetts men's rugby team who lost to Army in the first round of the post season playoffs.

In a hard-fought battle, the men showed their heart, which proved not enough to take them to the next level this season. Despite the defeat, it was a great trip to West Point, N.Y. There's nothing like a rugby road trip.

Just a few weeks ago, I had the opportunity to visit the Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children with a large group of student-athletes from UMass. In the playroom at the hospital I saw a lot of courage, a courage that just couldn't be compared to taking a last second shot with a game on the line.

Orange ya glad the semester is over? My misty-eyed memory for this semester would have to be the San Francisco 49ers dominating and defeating the Dallas Cowgirls. The fact that I hate Dallas made the victory oh-so- sweet.

I have liked the 49ers for years and, after being defeated by the Cowgirls the past two years in the NFC championship games, San Francisco has finally gotten revenge. Deion Sanders for president in 1996.

Brian Perillo

My memory can be explained in one word — baseball. Nothing makes me more misty-eyed than remembering when there was a Major League of players that actually spent their summers playing our national pastime and my favorite sport. Now, all baseball is, is a memory.

Honorable Mention — I would say the field hockey win over then-No. 1 UNC, but Matty V. would kill me if I stole his thunder. So what I do have is the UMass volleyball team, who surprised everyone this year by garnering 27 wins. Not only did the team have a campus-long 14 game- winning streak to start the season, but the coaches and players made it easy for this rookie writer to get his name in print.

Derek Milosavljevic

Who would have thought I would be treated to full-blown conflict and controversy covering the women's tennis team? In a gallant, but losing effort, the Minutewomen fell in a close contest to Central Connecticut State.

The highlight (or lowlight) of the meet was a John Chancyish showing by the CCSU head coach. After blowing his stack at everyone from his players to UMass Coach Judy Dixon, I asked if he thought it was appropriate to tell a UMass player to shut-up. His response: "She said it to me first."

Jamie Bearse

Alumni weekend tailgating was a sport in itself with Larry the Lizard — if you weren't at the pirate flag, you weren't there at all. Second place, UMass over Maryland. Then, da Browns over Dallas — what a day for sports with P. D. & Joel Ball. I can't forget, 4th and 1, 12-1 dance-offs, snowball battles with Alleycat, and the Cafe' with Steve-O.

Jorma Kansanen

What else would the "Flying Finn" have misty eyes about other than the NHL lockout. Contrary to the Cheech and Chong song, I got a hockey jones. (Oh baby, ooh-ooh-ooh!)

Other than seeing how the amiable Mike Keenan would do with Brett Hull, the league without Mario Lemieux, and Ray Bourque's quest for the illusive MVP trophy, the chance of not ever seeing a hockey game in the Gah-den kills me.

The team that is the Boston Garden has a very legitimate chance of not finishing the job right, and getting one more Stanley Cup trip in one of the hallowed halls of hockey is close to out of reach. With the baseball strike, this year will be known as the year of uncontrollable greed.

Anthony Guido

As usual my memories are jumbled. Starting with men's hoop, beating Arkansas, and then beating Maryland in Baltimore, is astounding. The trip to Baltimore brings a tear to the eye, the highlight being a conversation with Diek Vitale on press row.

My hoop team won the inaugural Candice Flemming Tip- off classic at Boyden, despite the fact that one of our forwards (Art) has a Dominique Wilkins shooter's mentality, but the skill of Acie Earl.

Also, Rene Ingoglia steamrolling over URI for 313 yards on the ground is something I'll never forget. Congratulations to Ingoglia and Brian Corcoran on being named third-team All-Americans.

Ted Kottler

Are you kidding me? 104-80? Who beats the national champs by 24? UMass, that's who. We may never witness such basketball perfection again, by anyone. It was a far cry from the comeback over UNC last November, when UMass appeared to be hopelessly outclassed early on. This

Murder of UMass senior goes before jury

■ James Cyr Jr., 24, is accused in the 1993 Tara Hartnett slaying

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

GREENFIELD — An Amherst man accused of murdering a University of Massachusetts senior two years ago went to court last week.

James R. Cyr Jr., 24, is accused of stabbing his ex- girlfriend, UMass student Tara Hartnett, 21, several times then setting fire to her Sunderland house back in March 1993.

Medical examiners said Hartnett died of smoke and soot inhalation.

First Assistant Northwestern District Attorney David Angier, who is prosecuting the case, alleges Cyr poured gas on Hartnett while she was still alive.

Cyr, who has been in custody since his arrest in 1993, has pleaded not guilty to charges of murder and arson.

There was a custody dispute over the then 11-month-old daughter they had together, Meghan Genevieve Cyr, which authorities believe may have been the motive for the killing.

One reason for the long delay of the trial was due to problems in testing blood found at the crime scene.

Investigators were unable to distinguish blood found near Hartnett's body, and blood possibly from the killer.

The samples were first tested by the State Police, then were sent to laboratories in Denver, Colo. after the commonwealth received a time extension.

The trial, which started Monday of last week, is believed to last roughly three weeks, said clerks at Franklin Superior Court.

Judge William Welch is presiding over the case. Cry's attorney, Richard Rubin, has not given a defense strategy, he is waiting for prosecution to rest.

Several local news sources contributed to this article.

Pay raise rejection seen as a 'declaration of war'

By Jessica Taverna and Tim White
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts faculty, administration and some local politicians are appalled at Governor William Weld's rejection to a pay-raise proposal that would increase teacher salaries over the next three years.

"This was not a nice rejection, it was a scathing denunciation," said Leo Richards, the president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the union that represents faculty and librarians.

In a letter from Charles Baker, Gov. Weld's administration and finance secretary, the State House rejected a 15 percent pay raise, on the grounds that UMass faculty are "underworked and overpaid."

"The letter carried strong implications," said Provost Patricia Crosson. "The message wasn't saying that they couldn't increase salaries, it was that they chose not to."

In a letter written to faculty in response to the rejection, Crosson wrote of the administration's disregard for major faculty sacrifices and hard work during a six-year period of budget cuts when faculty did not receive any raises.

"I have been a member of this faculty for 10 years and I know from my own observation and experience the host of minor miracles the faculty have performed to keep this campus going under the most adverse conditions," Crosson said.

This was a "declaration of war," according to State Representative Ellen Story, D-Amherst.

"On paper, while it is an attack on faculty workloads and salaries, in reality, it is an attack on its students and people in Massachusetts that want an affordable education," Richards said.

The letter sends the message to the UMass community that the governor's office holds students virtually in contempt, according to Richards.

Robert Bliss, spokesperson for Baker's office, said that their team was open to negotiations. He chose not to comment further.

According to Story, Baker's letter was either an attempt to "politically posture" himself or a show of an extreme lack of understanding of higher education.

Teenager's death leads to raid on campus dorm

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

In response to the drug related death of an Amherst teenager, police raided the Butterfield Residence Hall on the University of Massachusetts campus in search of heroin.

According to court documents, Amherst and UMass police entered room 403 Butterfield at 7 p.m. on Dec. 19. They obtained a plastic bag with a marijuana bud, two packages of rolling paper, five glassine wrappers, three razor blades and a plastic straw, all with heroin residue.

Police searched the room due to a possible connection with the death of Amherst-Pelham Regional High School senior Harrison "Ozzie" Klate, 17, who died of a heroin overdose at his home on Dec. 15, according to a police affidavit.

Amherst police Lt. Jeffrey Roy said no charges have been filed yet, but the police affidavit said Mark Ciarametaro, 21, and John Ciarametaro, 22, residents of 403 Butterfield, are suspected of dealing heroin.

An unnamed source in the police affidavit said John Ciarametaro, a junior Spanish major, sold 10 packets of heroin to Klate hours before he died.

According to court documents, the Ciarametaro brothers, from Rockport, are under investigation by the Rockport police for allegedly dealing drugs.

Mark Ciarametaro, a junior history major, was arraigned in Gloucester District court in August for possession of a class A substance, heroin, said the affidavit.

Klate's body was found by his father at 6:30 a.m. surrounded by five empty glassine wrappers, two plastic straws and a mirror all with a white powder residue. There were also four full bags of heroin stamped with the words "Green Giant," said the affidavit.

According to the affidavit, the police met with a female who was with Klate the night he died. She said she shared three packets of heroin with him the night he died, but Klate was still alive when she left at approximately 1:30 a.m.

Another friend, who approached the police the same day as a "concerned citizen," said she had spoken to Klate at the Classe Cafe, where he worked, about taking heroin. She said he wanted to "enhance his cre-

Bomb explodes in school lot

Northampton teen arrested; more devices found in home

By Tracy Monahan
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A 15-year-old student from Smith Vocational High School was arrested Friday after an explosive device went off shortly after 8 a.m. in the parking lot of the school.

Police found another 15 small, homemade bombs at the juvenile's home after the youth informed them of their existence. The bombs at the house were smaller than the device exploded at the school and were made of large rifle bullets filled with explosive material, fuses and packed with a filler.

The student is being charged with possession of an infernal machine.

Members of the State Police Bomb Squad detonated the bombs in the back of the juvenile's house on Warren Street. Michael Costello, a member of the bomb squad, said the mixtures used to make the explosive were not stable and they were detonated as a safety precaution.

Bomb squad members dug a small hole in the ground and wore protective suits to carry the explosive equipment out of the house. Costello said they also found and burned a supply of gunpowder.

He said the bomb used at the school was a pipe bomb, a plastic pipe filled with gunpowder and fitted with a timing device. The youth was not on the scene at the time of the explosion.

No one was injured at Smith Vocational but police Capt. Michael Wall said a teacher who was getting out of his van "felt some spray" as the device on the pavement went off.

The school was closed for the day as members of the bomb squad searched the building. Classes were also dismissed at Northampton High School, where a warning was found scrawled on a desk, Wall said.

Costello said no explosive devices were found at Northampton High and he believes the second threat was a "chain reaction" stemming from the early morning explosion.

The youth, who was not identified because of his age, was arraigned in Juvenile Court Friday afternoon. Juvenile court proceedings are confidential.

Authorities had no information on whether or not anyone had been a target but the investigation is still underway and tips are being followed.

Rent control ban delay excludes UMass students

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Students living off-campus may be facing increased rent because of Gov. William Weld's exclusion of full-time students to a special rent control extension.

With the passing of Question 9 in November, ending rent control in Massachusetts, Amherst seeks a two year extension to protect the elderly, disabled and low-income tenants for the next two years.

A request earlier this month by the select board asked State Rep. Ellen Story, D-Amherst, to find out if Gov. Weld will allow Amherst a two-year extension. As a result, there will be a special town meeting on Jan. 30 to determine the form of the special legislation, said Town Manager Barry Del Castilho.

A two year extension to the Jan. 1 deadline was granted to the towns of Cambridge, Boston and Brookline, while Amherst was left out. The extension is designed to protect those at risk from losing their homes.

Although Amherst never has had rent control, the town instead implemented the Housing Review Board, said the Director of Commuter Services at the University of Massachusetts Joanne Levenson.

The board, created in 1983, acts as rent control because it uses hearings to resolve complaints from tenants about high rent. The board is still effective even though it has not heard a case in three years, Levenson said.

"The board, by its very existence, acts as rent control," said Levenson. "It's a long and involved process when you get reviewed."

According to Story, the special act must still fall under the guidelines set by Gov. Weld. One of the parameters he requested is that the act not cover full-time students.

"Students were an easy category for him to exclude," said Story. "He listens to the real estate industry."

According to Story, Gov. Weld's staff made it clear that the act not Fall trial set for man accused of stabbing University student

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The trial for the stabbing of a University of Massachusetts student will not go to court until some time next September.

Daniel C. Bothwell, 18, of South Boston, was arraigned in Hampshire Superior Court in December on single counts of assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon, and assault with intent to kill.

"They said if [Bothwell] didn't make bail, the trial would have gone quicker," said Daniel P. Boudreau, the victim of the stabbing. "It's out of my hands now."

Bothwell was released by Judge William Welch on a $5,000 bond.

Boudreau, 18, of Quincy, was stabbed several times during a fight that broke out on North Pleasant St. on Oct. 30.

The fight started when a group of hitchhikers allegedly made hand gestures at a truck Boudreau was in with five other people. The driver of the vehicle then turned around and parked the car next to the group and a brawl ensued, police said.

Boudreau called an ambulance from Delta Upsilon fraternity house when he realized he had been stabbed.

Boudreau suffered from a collapsed lung, multiple-stab wounds in the side and back, and lacerations to the head.

"I usually play intramural basketball," said Boudreau. "But my lungs are still weak."

Bothwell was arrested in Boston following an investigation in November.

According to Boudreau, the police were tipped off by an anonymous phone call and they approached the group of people at UMass that were allegedly with Bothwell that night.

Boudreau said he thinks Bothwell's friends then led the police to South Boston.

Boudreau said he did not see Bothwell on the day he went to the indictment, so he has not been able to make visual affirmation of the alleged assailant.

"I did see the people that [Bothwell] came to visit at UMass though," Boudreau said.

According to Boudreau, he and a friend will have to be at court in September, but he is unsure if the others in the truck that night will have to appear in court.

"I wasn't really friends with the others," said Boudreau. "I think [the driver] didn't handle the situation right, but I have to take some responsibility, I got out of the truck."

Boudreau is returning to UMass for the Spring semester and said if he does decide to transfer to another school, it would be unrelated to this incident.

Upcoming Jewish Events

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

A number of events have been planned for the Jewish community in the upcoming semester both on and off campus.

Both Chabad House and Hillel House will be holding regular Shabbat services. Chabad House's services will be at 6 p.m. on Friday evenings and 10 a.m. on Saturday mornings, starting on Feb. 3. Services will be held every weekend except for Feb. 17 and 18.

Hillel will also be holding services at 6 p.m. on Friday evenings followed by Shabbat dinner at 7:15. On Feb. 10 there will be a musical service offered along with the regular service and the following week there will be a "teaching service" with explanations.

Hillel will also be holding a number of other events. They will start the month with two events from the Cultural Committee's Film and Lecture series.

Hampshire College Associate Professor of film and photography Abraham Ravett will be speaking on Feb. 15, after a showing of his movie Everything's For You. The film is about the maker's relationship with his deceased father, a survivor of the Lodz Ghetto and Auschwitz.

On Feb. 23, Yiddish Folk Singers on Miami Beach will be shown followed by a discussion with creator Joel Saxe. Saxe is a faculty member in the art department at Greenfield Community College.

Phil Cohen, a rabbi and visiting professor of Judaic Studies, will be speaking on Feb. 22. He will be speaking on "The End and Ending of Life: Jewish Perspectives" about Jewish views on euthanasia, suicide and life support systems.

The same evening the will be a workshop in the Hillel Kitchens on baking Challah.

On Feb. 24–25 there will be a "Mid-Winter Shabbat Retreat." The Jewish Community of Amherst will be sponsoring the retreat with Rabbi Dr. Arthur Green on "Seeking a Personal Spirituality: Jewish Sources, Traditions, God and Community."

According to Barbara Burkart, a member of the JCA congregation and co-organizer, there are various goals for the event.

The first goal will be to make Hasidism and Jewish spirituality in a non-orthodox community more accessible to the average person, Burkart said.

Friday night services will be led by Green, who is a specialist in these areas. He will also speak at Saturday morning services.

While the retreat is not designed for college students, they would appreciate it, according to Burkart.

She said that a lot of the college experience is about searching and that this could provide some information about different options.

A major goal will be building the community, Burkart said. "Our door is completely open."

There will also be meetings of the Gay Lesbian Bisexual Jewish Caucus which will have its first meeting on Feb. 8 to plan for the following semester.

"It will be an eventful semester," said Hillel President Nurit Ben-Harav. "We have a lot of interesting programs coming up. There's really something for everyone, cultural events, religious events and political events."

Five-College Women's Events

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Five College Women Studies Research Center brings women's studies scholars from the United States and abroad to speak to Five College faculty, students and community members.

This semester there will be several works in progress, talks and lectures from feminist scholars. The talks are held on Monday and Tuesday nights on a semi-weekly basis.

On Feb. 7 at 7:30 p.m., Rachel Roth, a Five College Women Studies Research Center Associate from Yale University, will speak on the connection between fetal rights and women's inequality in a talk entitled, "At Women's Expense: The Costs of Fetal Rights."

Professor of Politics at Oberlin College, Sonia Kruks, will give a works-in-progress talk entitled "Women's Experience:" A Useful Concept for Feminism?" on Feb. 13 at 4:30 p.m.

Rachel Joffe Falmangne, a Five College Women Studies Research Center Associate from Clark University, will take a feminist look at language and logic in a talk entitled "Toward a Feminist Theory of Inference" on Feb. 14 at 7:30 p.m.

On Feb. 21 at 7:30 p.m., a talk will be given by Five College Women Studies Research Center Associate from City University of New York Graduate Center's Ellie M. Hisama on the feminist interpretation of music in a talk entitled, "Gender and Modernism in the Music of Marion Bauer and Ruth Crawford Seeger."

Events are held in the Dickinson House Living Room at Mount Holyoke College. They are free and open to the public.

Obituaries

Cynthia Elbaum, 28, photographer

A former University of Massachusetts student and Smith College graduate died in an air raid in Grozny while working as a free-lance photographer in Russia.

Cynthia Elbaum, who was enrolled at the University of Massachusetts from 1984 to 1985 and 1986 to 1987, died on Dec. 22 during an air raid in Chechnya, a Russian republic.

Elbaum, 28, and other photographers were in Grozny square to take pictures of the destruction left by Russian jets in a raid that occurred on Dec. 21, according to an account from Steven Lehman, one of the photographers who was with her.

Lehman entered a building and Elbaum stayed on the street. Bombing was heard in the distance, and it got louder, signalling approaching jets, according to Lehman's account.

Lehman looked for cover, heard an explosion, exited the building to find his colleagues and saw cars burning. He found Elbaum's body and said she had died instantly, according to the account.

In 1989, Elbaum graduated from Smith College in Northampton with a Russian studies major and film studies minor. She grew up in Ashfield and was one of 18 victims killed in the Russian air raid. Ten were wounded.

Donations may be sent to the Cynthia Elbaum Scholarship Fund, established by Elbaum's family. The address is The Mary Lyon Education Fund Inc., P.O. Box 184, Shelburne Falls, 01370.

Theodore C. Caldwell, 90, faculty

A history professor who taught at the University of Massachusetts for 35 years died of a heart failure on New Years day.

Theodore C. Caldwell, who periodically served as chair of the department of history in his 35 years at UMass, died in Atlanta, GA.

Caldwell retired from UMass in 1970. He was a specialist in English history.

He served on the College of Arts and Sciences curriculum studies committee and the history department executive committee, and was faculty fellow to Southwest Residential College.

Born in 1904, Caldwell went on to receive a degree from the College of Wooster, Ohio, in 1925. He received his masters from Harvard University in 1927 and his doctorate from Yale University in 1934.

He wrote The Anglo-Boer War — Why Was it Fought? which was published in 1965 and was an active member of the William Smith Clark Society at UMass.

Caldwell was buried at the Wildwood Cemetery in Amherst.

The Collegian Arts & Living desk is looking for a Film Reviewer. Must have knowledge of film history, the industry and contemporary criticism (basically, who used to make the movies, who's making them now and who's writing about them). We're looking for a sharp-witted, perceptive critic who knows how to write and knows what they're doing. Come down to 113 Campus Center for an application. Call 545-1361 for more information. Ask for Jon Lupo.

Legal Services assists students

■ General issues can be resolved through campus law practice

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students in need of legal assistance do not need to wander far or dig deep into their pockets to find help.

The Student Legal Services Office (SLSO), a student- funded law office located in the Campus Center, offers graduate and undergraduate students a wide array of legal assistance. With three professional lawyers on staff, two of whom are full-time, students have a range of services available.

"We are a general practice office," said Sheila Casey Kelley, assistant to the director. "We deal with legal problems students generally have."

One of the goals of the office is to resolve problems for students in cases where it may be difficult or impossible to obtain affordable legal assistance.

Students have already paid for most services offered by the office through the Student Activities Trust Fund. Director Charles DiMare said students have paid about $18 per year for the legal services.

Roughly 2,000 students utilize the office each year, according to DiMare. The general problems students need assistance with are landlord/tenant, criminal laws, consumer laws, family, personal injury, labor, civil rights and University-related matters.

However, many of the problems students face would not be handled by a private attorney according to DiMare because the "special damages," which are monetary damages, are not particularly high.

For example, Kelley said many private lawyers would not want to take a case where students were denied their $800 security deposit because the damages are not high. However, Kelley said the SLSO recognizes that $800 is a lot of money to a student.

"We try to fill the gap," Kelley said, "between cases the private bar does not want to take with cases that address students."

The office also offers document preparation for which there is generally a minimal charge.

In the case the staff cannot assist a client, the SLSO will refer the student.

Going to bat for students

DiMare said the SLSO is active within the University and it's legal staff often has an impact on University policy. Representatives of the SLSO serve on boards and committees within the University. The SLSO also drafts bills at the request of the Student Government Association regarding policies on campus.

DiMare said bills have been drafted on several issues on campus where students have a legal right.

In the case of student being suspended or expelled, they currently do not have the right to council at the hearing. DiMare said it is "outrageous and unconstitutional" to not have a lawyer present. A bill has been drafted by the SLSO where students may have council present.

Other drafted bills, according to DiMare, include requiring the results of teacher evaluations to be made accessible to students.

Bills which are drafted must be approved by the student senate and then the University Board of Trustees has 70 days to reject the bill before it becomes University policy.

"This office will go to bat for students," DiMare said.

Representing students

The SLSO does have the power to file suit in court on behalf of a student. However, this litigation power is restricted by the University Board of Trustees. The SLSO does not have the power to sue the University, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, its municipalities or any other state agencies. The SLSO also may not advise or represent one student against another.

It was struggle for the office to have any type of litigation rights. Originally, the legal service office had full rights to file suits. For history of the office, see related story on this page.

While the SLSO can file suit, DiMare said most cases do not require litigation. If, however, a suit is filed in court on behalf of a student, the money paid through the student activities fee will not cover all the expenses.

Students are charged on a contingency fee where a percentage of the recoveries are paid.

Currently the office will be filing three suits, a sexual harassment case, a consumer and civil rights case, and a landlord/tenant dispute, within the next few months.

DiMare said all three cases have two things in common: the rights violations of students have been significant, but the "out-of-pocket" damages are not as great. DiMare said most of the cases the SLSO handles have these traits in common.

The legal team

Between the lawyers in the office, DiMare said they jointly have over 50 years of experience.

The office also offers internships to undergraduate students. These interns serve as legal assistants to the lawyers. Legal assistants do research and help the lawyers to determine what situations their clients are facing.

Many major public universities have a legal services office on campus, according to Kelley.

The lawyers in the SLSO are specialized to deal with students needs and higher education issues in general. DiMare said the SLSO staff meets with other universities' staff and is part of a larger network of student legal services.

On the side, SLSO lawyers are part of private practices. However, DiMare said they take vacation time to work in private firms.

Any student wanting more information or in need of assistance should make an appointment. Advice cannot be given over the telephone.

Litigation rights battle continues

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

While the Student Legal Services Office (SLSO) currently has the right partial litigation, this was not always the case. The struggle for the ability to file suits has been a long- fought battle.

Director Charles DiMare came to the legal services office on campus when the office had full litigation rights. While he said most legal problems do not require a lawsuit to settle, DiMare said litigation is an important and necessary function of the office.

"When the community recognizes we have litigation rights back, it will chill some of the misconduct in the community," DiMare said. "Knowing students have resources to high quality representation with little or no cost, the threat of a lawsuit will make them pause."

DiMare said the fear of the lawsuit is significant in protecting students from abuse such as landlord/tenant disputes and consumer rights cases.

A condensed history

The history behind the creation of a legal services on campus and its right to represent students was a tug-of-war for several years.

In 1973, the Legal Services Office (LSO) was created by the Student Government Association and the Graduate Student Senate to provide legal counselling and representation to students. The Office was created only after state legislation was passed, granting authority to the UMass Board of Trustees to establish and maintain a trust fund for student supported legal services.

In 1976, the office was granted temporary litigation rights and in 1977 was given permanent litigation authority. However, in 1986 the right of the LSO to file suit was revoked. The time between 1977 and 1986 was turbulent and the future of legal services on the UMass campus seemed uncertain.

With the right to file suit, the LSO had the authority to file suits against the University. DiMare said in his 16 years at the legal services, he filed suit against the University 13 times. One case, in particular, involved a multi-million dollar suit against the University for wrongly accusing a student of setting fires on campus in the early 1980s. The case was settled out of court for an undisclosed amount. Suits were also filed against UMass trustees, employees and towns by the LSO.

In the late 1970s, a lawsuit was filed against 80 department heads on campus to force the results of the teacher evaluations to be made available to students. The students lost the case, but DiMare said a bill is currently drafted for the Student Government Association to make the results of the evaluations available — over 10 years later.

In 1986, then-Chancellor Joseph Duffey and then-Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson commissioned a review of the Legal Services Office by an outside consultant who submitted a critical report. The UMass Trustees also rescinded their 1976 and 1977 votes.

By 1987, the Trustees voted to abolish the Legal Services Office and established the Legal Services Center, with no litigation authority.

Student involvement with the retention of the Legal Services Office and the right to file suit was strong. Students rallied on the Student Union Steps and filled class action lawsuits. A civil rights lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court to keep the litigation rights of the center which was rejected. The suit subsequently lost in the Court of Appeals.

From the late 1980s until 1993, students proposed the restoration of partial litigation several times.

In 1993, the Trustees voted to restore limited litigation, excluding litigation in cases against the University, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or any agencies or municipalities within the state. The office was also renamed the Student Legal Services Office.

The future of the SLSO

DiMare said the SLSO is now stable.

"There is a consensus among student leadership and the administration as to our missions, goals and objectives," DiMare said.

Currently the office only has three lawyers, two of whom are full-time. In the late 1970s and early '80s when the office was litigation on a permanent basis, DiMare said there were four lawyers. Within the next five to 10 years, DiMare said he would like to add another lawyer to staff and see more litigation through the office.

Litigation is also important to keep the lawyers sharp, DiMare said. Going to court allows the staff to be more involved with the community of lawyers in the area and also gives a new perspective on different issues.

"If we are not out there in the courts," DiMare said, "we become stale."

DiMare said most student who come for assistance do not understand the basics of the legal system. Going to court, DiMare said, helps the lawyers to be able to explain in simple terms to students what is going on and what can be done.

Legal assistance for UMass undergraduate and graduate students is paid through the Student Activities Trust Fund. Except in the case of litigation, most services offered by the office are already paid.

Any student in need of assistance should make an appointment to discuss the situation.

ativity," and was going to take some that night.

The witness also told police Klatc had gotten the heroin from a man named "Johnnie," who also worked at the student hang-out. She said "Johnnie" was known as a dealer, and probably needed counseling for his personal habit.

According to the affidavit, another informant who wished to remain anonymous, said her house-mate buys heroin from a Johnnie Ciarametaro. The informant, identified as a friend to Klatc, said she knew he had bought $140 worth of heroin from a worker at the Classe Cafe named Johnnie Ciarametaro.

It was the informant that lead the police to the Butterfield dorm, saying she had witnessed transactions and use of heroin in the dorm room.

Detective Barry Flanders, whom the affidavit cited as confirming Mark and John Ciarametaro residence in the Butterfield dorms, said the UMass police worked with Amherst police during the search. Flanders said there was an occupant in the room at the time of the search, but confirmed there were no arrests made at the time.

According to the UMass registrar's office Mark Ciarametaro is no longer enrolled with the University as of Dec. 23. John Ciarametaro is still enrolled.

Opinion/Editorial

Weld vs. higher ed.

The Weld administration's Jan. 5 letter to UMass President Michael K. Hooker denying professors a pay increase is symbolic of its lack of support of public higher education in general and the University of Massachusetts specifically.

Charles D. Baker, Gov. William F. Weld's secretary of administration and finance, delivered a statement supporting the rejection of a contract negotiated between Hooker and university faculty which included 9 percent across the board pay raises and 6 percent merit increases over three years.

Despite Baker's claim that UMass salaries are higher than the national average at public universities, a study in the Chronicle of Higher Education Almanac shows that after adjusting for the cost of living, University professors make almost $10,000 less than professors at research universities similar to UMass.

Between the fiscal years 1986–87 and 1992–93, state appropriations for higher education in the state fell 39 percent. Over the same period, faculty numbers declined by almost 13 percent. During this time, UMass professors were performing what Provost Patricia H. Crosson calls a "host of minor miracles to keep this campus going under the most adverse conditions."

Professors have endured a number of challenges in maintaining standards of academic excellence under an administration not particularly friendly to higher education. It is only fair that they receive fair compensation for the hardships endured.

Baker says in his report that "of the 43 faculty resignations during the last two years, none cited 'dissatisfaction with pay' as a reason for resignation." One might find instead that it is the Weld administration's ambivalence toward higher education which is draining our pool of dedicated professors.

Megan's laws up for review in some states

Geri Sahn

Last October, New Jersey Gov. Christine Todd Whitman signed a package of laws that require convicted sex offenders be subject to lifetime supervision. For example, if a person is released from prison after they serve a sentence for child molestation, residents of a town must be notified of their presence.

The new law, which have been titled Megan's Law, were brought about in response to an incident involving Megan Kanka of New Jersey.

Megan, who was 7 years old, was sexually assaulted and killed by a twice-convicted sex offender. The residents in the town did not know about the prior convictions.

The Megan's law require a community-notification provision as well as a registry of sex offenders. The registry requests all who are released to submit to lifetime community supervision and to provide blood for genetic testing and a DNA database. And although at least 25 states have passed similar laws, their constitutionality is still being questioned, especially by lawyers who defend the offenders.

Arguments have been made that if sex offenders are given more psychological treatment, they will be less likely to repeat their crime. Psychologists have said that a sex offender's personality disorder can be controlled.

Treatment costs money. And money should not be spent on people who commit a crime.

Critics say that a major flaw with the Megan's law is that when a community is notified of the presence of a sex offender in their town, the person's chances to "start over" are ruined. They also say that community notifications causes harrasing problems on the offender.

If a person molests a child, they should not be given a chance to rebuild their lives without remembering their crime. Experience has shown us that a person who commits that kind of crime will most likely do it again.

Community-notification laws have been cited as unconstitutional in five states. They are seen as a crime against a criminal's privacy rights. Constant supervision on the person's life may be unnecessary, but the residents of the town have a right to be aware of the offender's presence. Megan's family had no idea that a convicted sex offender lived across the street from them.

A spokesman from the State Department of Corrections in New Jersey said, "When you max out your time, you've paid your debt." He continued to say that after an offender is released, their rights to privacy should protect their past record from being publicized.

A sex offender shouldn't be given a certain time limit to pay for their crime. A person who commits a sexual offense should pay for it for the rest of their lives. Crimes such as child molestation are not mistakes, they are premeditated. Legislation must protect citizen's rights in finding ways to prevent the criminal from committing another crime.

If this means informing everyone in a town of a sex offender's presence and breaking their rights to privacy, then the laws should be changed, and this should be done. A citizen's rights should be protected before a criminal's right to privacy is.

Higher Learning's greater message

Caleb Cochran

As I walked out of the theater after seeing John Singleton's film Higher Learning recently, I shook my head and mumbled to one of my friends about how unrealistic the plot was, especially the portion which dealt with a White student who became so confused and frustrated with his college experience that he finally joined a group of skinheads.

I debated with my friend about the credibility of the plot and how I thought much of Singleton's depictions of the different races and groups on campus were very stereotypical (the Black kids were portrayed as bass- booming trash-talkers, the Whites as beer-slugging frat boys, etc.). However, the one part of the plot which really disturbed me was the skinhead segment.

The young man who became a skinhead was confused from the beginning of the film. Remy, played by Michael Rapaport, is a White kid from Idaho (another of Singleton's stereotypes) who quickly becomes disoriented at fictional Columbus University. He tries to hang out with the superstar black people from his dorm and several other groups before he is approached by a skinhead who asks Remy if he wants to go have a drink with him and some "friends." Before we know it, Remy is a full-fledged, gun- toting skinhead who wreaks havoc on the Columbus campus.

Although Singleton's portrayal of Remy may indeed be a reach, a recent story in the Boston Globe convinced me that the idea behind Remy is not too far off base.

"Brockton skinhead leader given 46-month prison term," the headline read. The story went on to reveal the details of the case: A 20-year-old Brockton man defaced two synagogues in Randolph and Brockton and chased young Black girls with baseball bats. Although the young Brockton man was not a college student, the connection with Singleton's Remy is undeniable. Both were young, troubled White men who took a tragically wrong route in the search to fit in.

Although the details of the Brockton case and Singleton's character are far from identical, the point is that Singleton's idea is not as unrealistic as I first thought it to be. Which got me thinking.

If the skinhead portion of the film, which I thought to be the most unrealistic part, could in fact happen, what about the other "unrealistic" events in the film? Racist police who crack down on Black students at every turn but look the other way when Whites step out of line? It looked pretty fake the way Singleton portrayed it, especially a particular exchange between one officer and Fudge, played by Ice Cube. In the scene, Fudge questions the officer as to why the police always come and tell the Black students to turn their music down while the loud music of the Whites never brings the police. The officer's reply is something smug about how he "digs rock n' roll," and therefore would cut the Whites a break. Again, I thought this scene was unrealistic in which the singer Shoreter Malik, played by Omar Epps, is beaten fully by a pair of White cops (Just police in an unnecessarily bad light.

However, this does not mean that the idea is unrealistic. While racist campus police may not be the norm, Singleton's point is that they do exist, just as skinheads exist. Exploited athletes, date rape, sabotaged peace rallies — these are just a few of the other issues Singleton tackles in his film. And while cramming all of them into a neat two-hour package may seem a bit far-fetched, the point is that all of these problems do exist and all of them need attention. Higher Learning's greatest lesson thus lies not in the specific events of the film, but with the greater problems that these events represent.

An administration's shining moment

Arthur Stapleton Jr.

The more things change, the more they stay the same.

There are always happenings you can count on — a constant influx of students, faculty and weirdos in and out of the Valley of Political Correctness; people moving on to bigger and better adventures after graduation.

There will always be those who think they are in the real world, yet they leave this one realizing they were wrong.

Since my freshman year, there have been a lot of changes, some good, some bad. When I came to this University, the on-campus administration was headed by Richard O'Brien, the ex-interim chancellor of our humble institution.

I honestly can't remember one person who complimented Chancellor Dick. He caught flack for everything he did and didn't do — from the SGA to the student press. Dick O'Brien did nothing right, at least until he resigned.

When O'Brien left his position at the end of the spring semester in 1993, David K. Scott took office after an extensive search. Three semesters later, Scott can't get a compliment from anyone, either.

He's been trashed by the SGA, the BSU, the student press and, indirectly, even by his own boss. Maybe the chancellor, whomever he/she is, isn't supposed to be liked by anyone.

Or maybe the University should change their hiring process and alter the qualifications somewhat.

Anyway, hindsight is 20/20 and O'Brien made one tremendous hiring that needs to be commended; the naming of Bob Marcum as athletic director was one move that the University is still benefiting from.

Amidst questions about Marcum's six-year stay as AD at the University of South Carolina and the fact that USC was put on probation during his tenure, O'Brien hired him. Accusations about Marcum's involvement in the violations surfaced quickly.

In 1987, the NCAA placed South Carolina's men's basketball program on probation for a number of violations from 1982, when Marcum began his stint as AD, to 1985. Charges included providing players with improper financial aid and free use of automobiles.

According to an NCAA report, South Carolina was also charged with providing recruits with the use of automobiles, lodging, employment, entertainment, providing players with "extra benefits" and engaging in "questionable practices" [Collegian, Jan. 27, 1993].

From the very beginning, Marcum denied that he was involved in any way with the violations, yet there was still doubt. O'Brien stuck by his decision.

Even up until the hiring of Marcum, coaches petitioned for Glenn Wong, who was serving as interim athletic director and is now the chair of the University's Sports Management Department, to remain as AD. O'Brien received a letter which was signed by 14 of 18 UMass head coaches, urging the hiring of Wong. However, O'Brien made it a point to say that at no time was Wong a candidate because of his position on the search committee for a new AD.

"He couldn't be a candidate because he was on the search committee. It never arose to stack Glenn up against Bob Marcum," O'Brien said in a 1993 interview with the Collegian.

That was it. Marcum was the man to lead the UMass Athletic Department out of the shambles it was left in only six months earlier when the department was rocked by a probe investigating misappropriation of funds.

Fast forward to 1995 and the nay-sayers are shaking their heads in disbelief. The University of Massachusetts has had its men's basketball team ranked No. 1 in the nation and its women's basketball team poised to take that next step.

The school has a hockey program which is taking its lumps in the best conference in America in only its second year back from the dead; a football program which actually has some believing it will make the jump from Division I- AA to I-A; a volleyball team which, in only its second season since it was reinstated in 1993, made the post-season.

More than the success, Marcum has given the athletic department an identity. From putting a sign similar to the University of Notre Dame's "Play Like Champions Today" outside Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium to acting as the true figurehead of the department by keeping the bad publicity to a minimum, a la the Fighting Irish, Marcum has been a savior and deserves some thanks.

And for possibly the first time in a while, Dick O'Brien deserves some praise as well, for sticking to his guns and hiring Marcum. This time a lot of good came out of something extremely bad.

New Republican agenda rivals T.V.'s best scripts

E. C. Thomas

"Washington, where Clinton lives? Isn't it incredibly dangerous there?" a Japanese man, whose home and restaurant were damaged by the Kobe earthquake, was quoted as saying in last week's Newsweek. Indeed Washington has always been a melting pot of political foes, but lately, with its new Republican agenda it seems to have become the image of something out of a "Melrose Place" episode.

Enter Traci Lords, a mysterious Melrose-ian involved with a shady cult.

Enter Newt Gingrich, followed by the 104th Congress.

The Republican campaigns, a majority endorsed and financed by the religious right and the firearm and tobacco industries, are ready and waiting with a new set of values for Americans. Freedom of thought, expression and religion are out; freedom of White, heterosexual, Christian, gun- toting Americana is in. No one is safe. Last year, they targeted "Sesame Street's" Ernie and Bert, as the representative of gay America. This year, PBS' Barney and Big Bird are on their hit list. Their "God" is one angry and vengeful individual, and they will stop at nothing to achieve their version of a 100 percent Puritan America.

Peter Burns diverts research funding for the hospital into his own pocket.

Newt Gingrich makes a $4.5 million dollar book deal.

Although now agreeing to forgo his advance for his book on "Renewing America" and take only one dollar, his initial motives are still highly questionable. The two-book agreement with Rupert Murdoch's Harper Collins has been looked at as a political thank-you gift.

NBC wants to stop Murdoch's efforts to add TV stations to his FOX broadcasting network and regulators are investigating allegations that his network is illegally controlled by foreigners. Murdoch, known for decades for his courting of politicians, is suspected of trying to win support against FOX's challenges.

Kimberly pays for a hate crime against Matt.

The religious right finances the November Republican victory.

With 10 states in January 1994 proposing ballot initiatives aimed at repealing or preventing anti-discrimination protections for gay men and lesbians, efforts to censor gay- themed and world religion information in public school health classes and libraries, and the drive to keep gays out of the military, homophobia and the institutionalizing of intolerance are becoming the widespread focus of the religious right.

Jo gives her baby up for adoption.

Newt Gingrich proposes the return of orphanages.

The revival of "Boys Town" never crossed our minds as a rational solution to the welfare problems of America — but it's here. Gingrich has proposed that the children of unwed teenage mothers be removed from their families and placed in orphanages. What seems clear is that this rhetoric about "values" translates as a punishment for poor children for illegitimacy and other ills outside of their control.

Michael tells Amanda she has cancer.

If she had been in the kitchen instead of the boardroom, perhaps this could have been avoided.

From his mother calling the First Lady a "bitch" (are they studying "Melrose" scripts as well?), to claiming that females have biological problems with going into combat, to efforts at stealing their children away — Gingrich and his friends have made their position on a woman's place pretty clear.

It's amazing that Gingrich's claim as a "revolutionary" hasn't laughed him right out of the spotlight. But just as Amanda's learning that what goes around, comes around, Newt's getting a few doses of his own medicine. Maybe he'll learn. Maybe he'll even start working for all Americans, instead of the selective few of whom he approves. Maybe the Republican's Contract with America does have the solutions to a better America. And maybe Kimberly's not a certifiable menace. But hey, you never know what can happen in Washington, perhaps Clinton can even survive the '96 election — Jake survived the boat explosion, didn't he?

First Black woman ready to head Smith

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

When Smith College students return to campus in the fall of 1995, they will not only have a new course load, but a new president — a groundbreaking president.

Recently-elected Ruth Simmons is the first African– American woman to be appointed president of a nationally– renowned college. She was chosen from a group of 350 candidates.

"She has imagination, vision, tremendous strength of character and works exceptionally well in places like Smith College," according to Peter Rose, chair professor and member of the presidential selection committee.

Simmons has many years of experience as a senior academic administrator, which was an important factor in the committee's decision.

Simmons holds a doctorate from Harvard University and has taught at a number of universities throughout the south and the west, Rose said. She was also the provost at Spelman College in Georgia for two years, and now holds the position of vice provost at Princeton University in New Jersey.

"She was chosen because her ideas, her education and her vision for Smith were what we were looking for," said Anne Benidict, a senior economics and American studies major at Smith who served on the presidential search committee.

Simmons went through many interviews and meetings before she was announced to be the new president, Rose said.

"The first time she came to Smith, she went through an intensive schedule of meetings with student leaders, faculty and random groups of students," Rose said. "This series of sessions included open and closed interviews."

After three interviews, Simmons rose up to receive the highest ratings from the selection committee and to a position of the "number-one finalist," according to Malgorzata Pfabe, a Smith College professor of physics on the selection committee.

"She has a good repoire, she is a good mentor and an effective administrator," Pfabe said. "She can make decisions, but can also listen well. She has experience as a teacher and has proved that she can interact with all kind of constituencies."

According to Rose, the student response has been "overwhelming."

"Both times Simmons visited, the students were very excited, and I have seen a positive and favorable response."

Scott reinforces position on student confidentiality

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

In a memo released Jan. 13, Chancellor David K. Scott reaffirmed the University's commitment to "preserve the confidentiality of [student] records."

The rules of confidentiality are laid out in the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA), commonly known as the Buckley Amendment and in University regulations in the Faculty Guide.

The Faculty Guide states "the academic record of each student is considered restricted information properly available for use within the University by deans, advisors or member of the faculty, and may be released only to the student or at the student's request."

It also states that grades can be posted but should use ID numbers and not names.

According to the Buckley Amendment, academic records are defined as records directly related to a student and maintained by an educational agency or institution.

The reason for the confidentiality according to the memo is "to avoid embarrassing the individual students and to foster a spirit of trust and confidence in the relationship between a student and the University and its faculty and staff."

Problems of confidentiality stem from two incidents last semester.

The first was when the Boston Globe printed an article on Oct. 20, 1994. In it they published the grades of the UMass men's basketball team.

The second incident occurred on Nov. 1, 1994. Brad Smith, a reporter for the Springfield Union News, showed copies of confidential information about Black students to a Media Criticism class taught by Steve Simurda. Smith also showed the transcripts of the basketball players used by the Globe for the previous story.

According to the memo, penalties could result due to infractions of the Buckley amendment. The institution could lose federal funding and the employee could be personally liable to an injured student.

Provost Pat Crosson was unavailable for comment on whether any penalties have occurred from the earlier incidents.

Confusion, misinformation plague tuition bills

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Spring tuition bills have caused confusion for many students for four major reasons: late distribution, a change in the due date, unnecessary supplemental information and a notice intended for some students was printed on all bills.

Bursar Karen Lee Shelley said spring bills are usually sent early in December, but this year they were sent late. The Bursar's Office postponed the original print date of Dec. 5 and 6 in order to "clean up" information printed on the bill. Computer problems further delayed printing until Dec. 12.

Spring bills are usually due the first week in January, but Shelley said "for a variety of reasons I selected the date Dec. 30" to accommodate the conflicting needs of students, parents, her staff and other departments.

Shelley said few people have complained about the length of time to pay the bill. She said students had "exactly the same time period that people had in May and August, approximately two and a half weeks." Those students who have a problem have made arrangements or have been granted extensions.

The bill included unnecessary information regarding past transactions, which made some bills confusing. Shelley said the 15-year-old computer system they use to print the bills caused this information to appear on the bills.

Prior to printing the bills, the computer system purges transactions occurring prior to the current bill. This purge took place on Nov. 23, but due to the delay in printing, activity taking place between the purge and printing date were erroneously included on the bill.

Shelley said the excess information printed was correct, but only makes sense in an accounting or auditing sense.

There were also more entries than usual printed on the bills because, as Shelley explains, she is new in the position of bursar and has "made some mistakes."

Possibly the most confusing part of the bill, Shelley said, was the inclusion of a "message intended for 1,600 [students], not the entire population." Shelley said this was a "mis-communication between the Bursar's Office and Financial Aid."

The message read, "Fall pending Stafford Loans have been canceled" and directs what action the student should take.

Shelley said some students who had already received their fall loans missed the word "pending" and worried needlessly about their loan status. Other students mistook the message to mean all their Financial Aid had been cancelled and they panicked. Those the message applied to, Shelley said, read the message and either took the correct action, or ignored the message entirely.

On Dec. 21 Financial Aid Services sent a postcard telling students to "disregard the message concerning the cancellation of the pending Stafford Loan." Three days later, the Bursar's Office sent out a letter to "let people know we want to be responsive to their concerns," and included a list of numbers to call to receive assistance.

The Bursar's and Financial Aid Offices tried to answer as many questions as possible, while the Dean of Students, Housing, Admissions and Registrar's Offices fielded calls.

A Financial Aid phone room employee said they have received a high volume of calls, but cannot tell if the volume is higher than usual. The employee explained that many people are asking the Financial Aid Office questions only the Bursar's Office can answer. Assistant Dean of Students Eileen Stewart said their office has received "no more phone calls than usual during opening."

Shelley said for the most part people didn't understand the bills, but the Bursar's Office "hopes to improve those problems by making the bill easier to use." For example, Shelley said the office is attempting to make the bill and instructions clearer and more readable, as well as informing students their bill can be paid by credit card.

Originally the Bursar's Office planned to waive the late fee until Jan. 13. When it became obvious that several students needed more time, the grace period was extended to the first day of classes, Jan. 31. Shelley said anyone having a problem after that date can appeal the late fee by filling out a standard form at the Bursar's Office.

Toll-free hotline available for students

Offers assistance, advice with financial aid forms for 1995-96

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

A toll–free hotline is now available for students who need help with their financial aid forms.

The Bank of Boston and the Massachusetts Association of Financial Aid Administrators are sponsoring a toll–free student financial aid hotline and free financial aid clinics.

Students can reach the hotline at 1–800–442–1171.

According to Lyndsay Carlisle, financial aid advisor at Boston College and representative of the association, financial aid experts will staff both the hotline and clinics. The professionals will assist students in determining what type of financial aid they are eligible to receive.

The hotline is available from Jan. 23 until Feb. 9. Clinics will be held through out the state on Feb. 4 from 10 a.m. till 2 p.m.

The closest clinics to the University of Massachusetts are in Worcester and Chicopee. The Chicopee clinic is at the Educational Opportunity Center, 35 Center St. The Worcester clinic is at the Edcentral in the Worcester Public Library, 3 Salem Square.

"It is a place to find out about financial aid," said Burt Batty, director of Financial Aid Services at UMass.

The program focuses primarily on incoming students who are unfamiliar with the financial aid system, but does not offer personalized financial services, Batty said.

Batty said the service is focused on Massachusetts colleges and universities, and is designed to answer basic financial aid questions.

Now is the time to file financial aid forms because they are due on Feb. 15, Carlisle said.

The association, a non–profit organization, is composed of financial aid advisors from two year and four year institutions through out the Commonwealth according to Batty.

The bank is helping by funding the program, Dave Kelly, student loan manager, said.

"We are proud to help unlock the door to academic advancement for ambitious young people in our community," Vice Chairman of the bank Edward O'Neal said.

New McDonald's Express opens downtown

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

As students drove through Downtown Amherst on Sunday, many were probably surprised to see the Golden Arches next to Antonio's Pizza.

According to Laura Radwell, marketing consultant at Radwell Marketing and Advertising, the new McDonald's will be a McDonald's Express.

"It is an incredible opportunity to open in Amherst," Radwell said.

Students comprise the largest consumers of fast food, Radwell said. She anticipates that most of the customers will be from the University and nearby Amherst College.

"The restaurants are gouging us," Ashwin Ru, a graduate student studying Industrial Engineering, said. "McDonald's and Taco Bell are positive."

Radwell explained that in order for businesses to survive they need a unique niche. She said that Amherst lacks a burger restaurant, and McDonald's Express will fill the void.

Chris Sarage, manager of Antonio's Pizza, agrees with Radwell's idea of niche marketing. He pointed out that Uptown Pizza failed because it was entering a market which was already filled by Antonio's. McDonald's Express is opening where Uptown Pizza was located.

Sarage said that Antonio's and McDonald's are different and both can survive side by side in Amherst.

The menus at the two restaurants are different and Antonio's is a fast, fresh alternative, Sarage said.

"We hope there will be no negative effects," Sarage said. "Hopefully we can carry on a good relationship."

McDonald's may help attract people back to Amherst Center and away from the malls and Northampton, Sarage said.

McDonald's will commercialize Amherst Center, according to Naomi Seligman, a UMass senior political science and communications major.

"I think the teens will hang out around McDonald's which will ruin the atmosphere of the Center," Seligman said.

McDonald's will be closing at 10:00 p.m. on weeknights, and 11:00 p.m. on weekends, eliminating any late-night problems, Radwell said.

McDonald's Express offers a streamlined menu which lacks items like the burger of the month and shakes, Radwell said. The streamlined menu will include breakfast and the classic burger menu along with some untraditional fair, like soup and Breyer's ice cream.

For a limited time, McDonald's Express will be offering coupons for free super-sizing of extra value meals.

Brookline attacks leave abortion clinics cautious

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

Many local abortion-related organizations have become more cautious in light of the recent attack on two Brookline Clinics where two staff members were killed.

"We realize there are others out there who are capable of the same thing," said Carol Ramsey, Consulting Supervisor at the Hamden Gynecological Association in Springfield. "We are shocked, but we understand that it could happen here or anywhere."

"Even with the new security, I still don't feel 100 percent protected."

In early January, a gunman opened fire on two Brookline abortion clinics, killing two and seriously wounding five.

John C. Salvi, a 22-year-old Catholic from Hampton, N.H. has been charged with the killings.

As of this printing, there have been no incidents or threats to the Springfield clinic or its employees.

Although new security helps ease the fear, it is still difficult to feel unthreatened, Ramsey said.

Hamden Gynecological Association, which performs abortions, hired a temporary security guard and is considering hiring full-time security, Ramsey said.

"Even with the new security, I still don't feel 100 percent protected," said Ramsey. "There is not much a security guard can do if someone walks in and starts firing. There was a security guard in Brookline, and he was shot."

Aside of the new security, business is being conducted as usual, Ramsey s. I. The association does not foresee any decrease in clientele because of the recent incident.

"I think women may have increased fear about terminating a pregnancy, but women who have made up their minds are determined and will not let an incident like this stop them," Ramsey said.

There are even protestors who have altered their practices, following the incident in Brookline.

In mid-January Catholics for the Unborn, a Springfield-area anti-abortion group said it would suspend its protests outside abortion clinics until the spring.

Regardless, Family Planning in Northampton, an organization that offers counseling, continues to support increased security and protection for medical professionals and their patients, according to Cathy Moore, a spokesperson for Family Planning.

"This is an incorporated lesson brought to bear for all medical professionals, that measures need to be taken to protect staff," Moore said.

Massachusetts is one of 17 states in the United States and the District of Columbia that provides public assistance for abortions for "medically necessary" abortion procedures for low-income women.

In 1993, there were 35,312 abortions performed in Massachusetts, according to the state Department of Public Health.

A representative from the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Mass, who chose to remain anonymous, said she thinks the unpleasant incident may have a positive effect on her organization, which provides funding for people who cannot afford abortions.

"I think donors and providers are more alert, and that they will stay, and maybe even increase support. We may see new donors, too."

Munson Hall Annex re–opens; $150,000 renovations finished

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

After being shut down over winter session due to asbestos removal, the Munson Hall Annex has recently been reopened.

Due to needed asbestos removal and other safety repairs, Eugene Novak, state building inspector for District 8, ordered University officials to leave the building until the repairs were completed.

According to Donald Robinson, director of Environmental Health and Safety (EH&S), the Annex was closed at the end of last semester.

"The renovations were started immediately after that," said Robinson.

The Art Department's Ceramics Studio, which is located in the Annex, was shut down according to Mark Schwinger of Physical Plant Operations. No classes were held during intersession, Schwinger said.

According to Robinson, the needed repairs have been completed and a certificate of inspection is expected shortly.

University personnel from the Physical Plant, EH&S and the Art Department worked with Novak to plan out the repairs with a minimum of disruption.

The repairs cost an estimated $150,000, said Schwinger. The Physical Plant will be responsible for the expense.

An outside contractor, Marcor Environmental of Woburn, handled the removal of the asbestos, said Schwinger.

Other work, such as the installation of a fire alarm system, new electrical wiring, exit signs, suspended ceilings and emergency lighting, was completed by Physical Plant staff, said Schwinger.

A roof structure housing two kilns at the rear of the building was also demolished due to its instability, Schwinger said. A new enclosure will be built to keep the direct weather off the kilns, Schwinger said.

Physical Plant, EH&S and Art Department personnel moved studio materials and furnishings to storage units brought to the site.

"The occupants of the building were fantastic," said Robinson.

The Annex officially reopened on Jan. 24.

New system can access gov't files

■ Computer program created at UMass has varied capabilities

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

A new computer system unveiled by Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich was created by the University of Massachusetts Computer Science department.

After three years of development, the UMass Center for Intelligent Information Retrieval has released "Thomas," a system meant to retrieve information about governmental agencies and legislation — straight out of Washington, D.C.

"Thomas," named after President Thomas Jefferson, can be accessed by anyone with a computer, modem and an Internet account from anywhere in the country.

"It was designed to search hundreds of thousands of documents...with response times in under ten seconds," said Paul McOwen, the administrative director of CIIR.

The program was designed in a collaborative effort by faculty, staff and graduate students, according to Professor Bruce Croft, chief scientist at the CIIR.

The CIIR, established on-campus two years ago in an effort to address the growing problem of measuring electronic information in different sectors of society, considers "Thomas" a departmental success.

"It improves our research and gives us good visibility," Croft said. "We have an impact on society."

"Thomas" has the capability to provide information about congressmen, House committees and floor schedules, hearing schedules and visitor information.

Within "Thomas" is a document retrieval system called "INQUERY," which provides access to full texts of bills from Congress and legislation that is currently pending.

This new system of information retrieval has attracted a variety of different users.

Users so far include the Department of Commerce, which is accessing the systems to explore and document export opportunity, and assemble a national trade database, Croft said.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. is using the systems to store their wealth of archives, he said. The archives include transcripts of survivors' accounts, documents and photographs.

"We have hundreds of survivors' testimony," said Aaron T. Kornblum, the reference archivist at the museum. "We have more than 1.7 million pages of documents from the former Soviet East describing the persecution of Jews, gypsies, homosexuals, Jehovah's Witnesses, Russian prisoners of war and millions of others."

Library of Congress has used the system to store and retrieve legal texts, photographic images, speeches and films, McOwen said.

Dean Wilder, the Senior Systems Analyst of the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., said he was pleased with the "cooperative effort" between the library and UMass Department of Computer Science.

"We're very, very happy with [Thomas" and "INQUERY"], he said. "It's one of the leading systems existing today."

Two groups to support abuse survivors

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

Guilt, blame, intimacy and trust are just a few of the feelings that the counselor/advocate-sponsored programs at the Everywoman's Center will focus on this semester.

The two programs, one for adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse and the other for survivors of rape, will each run ten weeks and will accept group members by initial interview.

"The groups require an initial interview because we want women who are stable and who have a common ground, like similar experience and common age, so the members can help each other," said Cat Chapin, a Northampton social worker and leader of the program for women who were sexually abused as children.

University of Massachusetts graduate Rachel Thorburn is co-facilitating the group for survivors of rape with Giselle L'Italien, a therapist at Bangs Community Center in Amherst.

"The programs are of the few free in the area which offer support to students and women in the community in various stages of healing," Thorburn said.

Thorburn's group will discuss ways to form healthy relationships.

"We will talk about guilt, self blame, self esteem and ways to look for support," Thorburn said. "My goal is to help survivors feel less alone and to look for the positive from their experience, like regaining a stronger sense of self and being more assertive in relationships."

Chapin's goal is to bring women together who can help each other by sharing experiences and feelings, she said.

"The group will help with coping strategies and finding solidarity with other survivors," Chapin said.

The Everywoman's Center hires social workers to form groups such as these.

"Professional therapists with proven track records are hired through the center below the going rate," Chapin said.

Although the pay is low, Chapin said working there is a rewarding experience.

"Feminine services is a way of feeding myself," Chapin said.

Both Chapin and Thorburn think the response to the groups will be good, and have already had a large number of people express interest.

"Last semester the response was extremely positive, and I think this semester will be the same," Chapin said.

According to Chapin, the response to evaluations in the past has shown the groups to be a positive experience for participants.

The deadline for these two groups will be Feb. 10. For more information contact the Counselor/Advocate Program at the Everywoman's Center at (413) 545-0800.

In addition to these two programs, the center has free training available for those women who wish to become counselors for the counselor/advocate program. The deadline for the counselor training application in Feb. 6.

broaden from its original specifications, making it almost futile for students to be requesting an amendment to it.

"We know there will be a motion on the floor to include students [at the town meeting]," said Levenson. "Rent could sky-rocket; students would have less protection than other tenants in town."

Levenson said she feels the students were excluded because they are a vulnerable population that does not have lobbyists at the statehouse.

"The University can only house 50 percent of the students," said Levenson. "So why should students get punished for living off-campus?"

Story said she feels excluding students is unfortunate and short-sighted by the governor.

"[Gov. Weld] doesn't have a lot of patience for people who don't have a lot of money," said Story. "I disagree with a number of things he's doing."

The special act would still cover elderly, handicapped and low-income families. A yearly income of about $24,000 and under is considered low income. This includes most students, but they still would not be protected by the act, said Levenson.

Story said there is still some question as to whom is considered a full-time student.

"No one knows what the definition of a full-time student is," said Story. "There are still a lot of questions here."

STUDENT COMMENCEMENT SPEAKER

Is there something you would like to say immediately before graduating? If so, you are invited to submit a proposal for consideration as the Student Commencement Speaker.

Eligibility:	Graduating UMass-Amherst Senior.
Format:	Submit not more than three word-processed or typewritten pages, double-spaced, or the equivalent of 3-5 minutes speaking time.
Subject Matter:	Text should concern higher education, and be relevant to the University and your experience(s) here.
Submit Proposal To:	Paul R. Appleby, ADA Compliance Officer, AA/EO Office, 305 Whitmore.
Selection Process:	A committee of students (majority), staff, and faculty will review the proposals. Authors' names will be deleted prior to the committee's review to ensure objectivity. Ratings will be assigned and selected authors will be invited to "audition" before the committee (in March), after which the finalist will be selected.
Deadline:	Wednesday, February 22, 1995, 4:30 p.m.

Amherst residents upset over construction

Three new University buildings cause concerns for Fairview Way landowners

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Local residents are in the process of meeting with University of Massachusetts officials with concerns about the construction of three new University buildings.

The Fairview Way neighborhood, located just north of the Graduate Research Center, is to be the location of a new computer science building, a chemical engineering building and a new power plant within the next five years. The site is currently occupied by two parking lots and some fields.

"The encroachment of the University on our already isolated neighborhood is going to make the area unlivable within a few years unless protective measures are taken," said Steve Anzovin, a Fairview Way resident, in a letter to University Chancellor David K. Scott.

Anzovin is a member of a delegation of five Fairview residents who have been meeting with University officials since last December.

The University has also been holding open meetings to which anyone is welcome. The last meeting, held on Jan. 3, 1994, was attended by approximately 25 people, said William Rose, associate vice chancellor for facilities and campus services.

Ongoing problems

This is not the first time local residents have complained about University construction.

According to Anzovin, the Fairview neighborhood has had to put up with annoying noise emissions from the Lederle Graduate Research Center due to its air filtration system.

The Silvio O. Conte Polymer Science Center was built 40 years away from the nearest home and the university sought no input from the residents, said Anzovin.

"We are working with the University to help develop a master plan for building so it has the least impact on the neighborhood," Anzovin said.

The re-routing of Governor's Drive, currently the northern boarder between the Fairview neighborhood and the University, is of major concern.

With the construction of the new buildings, Governor's Drive will have to be re-directed, according to Beverly Wood, associate vice chancellor for physical planning. It is the degree of the change which concerns the residents, who are concerned with the proximity of the road and their property and how any changes would affect traffic.

Increased noise, any hazardous materials, the proximity of buildings to residential property and air and light pollution were other concerns raised by the delegation, Anzovin said.

"We are interested in listening to all constituents directly involved in any campus development, wherever they may be," Rose said.

According to both Anzovin and Rose, the University has responded to the concerns raised by the residents.

Computer Science Building

Originally, the computer science building was to be a four story building. The residents protested, claiming it would block the view around their homes.

After consulting the Computer Science Department and the architects to see if it was feasible, the University decided the building design could be adjusted to make it three floors instead.

Anzovin said he sees this as an improvement in how the University responds to the concerns of its neighboring residents.

"We are getting a say," Anzovin said.

According to James Cahill, director of facilities planning, portions of lots 31 and 45 are sites for campus development. "All parking will be replaced and any additional parking needed will be built," Wood said.

Increasing need for buildings

The Computer Science Chairperson, Professor David Stemple, said the computer science department needs this new building.

"We're bursting at the seams in this department," said Stemple.

According to Stemple, in 1981 the computer science department had six support staff, 13 faculty, two professional staff and approximately $1 million in grants.

By 1994, the computer science department had 17 support staff, 38 faculty, 60 professional staff and about $8.7 million in grants, Stemple said.

The computer science department is inappropriately using class space, and this new building will allow them to give most of it back, Stemple said.

Currently, the computer science department is housed in the LGRC, the Lederle Graduate Research Tower and Hasbrouck Labs, Stemple said.

Professor Michael Doherty, head of the chemical engineering department, said his department desperately needs this new building.

According to Doherty, many of the department's experimental labs are located in Goessmann Laboratory, which was built in the 1920s and '30s.

"It's just no longer a building that's appropriate for modern 21st century work," Doherty said.

Doherty described the building as very dusty leaving the labs constantly covered with a thin layer of dust.

Doherty said the department would be moving its laser and light scattering experimental labs and it's high precision electronic equipment to the new building when available.

"The labs on this campus for scientific research is really not adequate," said Doherty.

Doherty said he was pleased with the initial plans for the new building.

Power plant

According to Rose, the current University power planet "is on the verge of collapse."

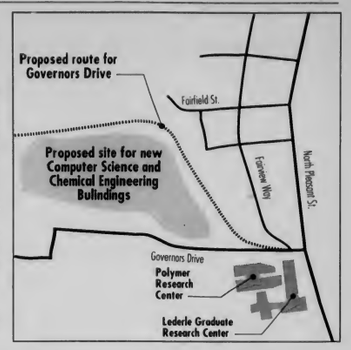
Parts of the current plant are as much as fifty years old or more, Rose said. Replacement parts are sometimes unavailable and have to be specially made to fit the older technology.

The new plant, when built, would be smaller, cleaner and be ready to provide higher levels of power if and when the University grows, Rose said.

The new plant is also being financed and run by a third party, which means less of a financial burden and risk to the state of Massachusetts.

According to Rose, the current plant would probably be dismantled once the new plant comes on-line, and current University power plant employees would receive the first opportunity for jobs at the new plant.

The next meeting is scheduled for Feb. 8 at 4 p.m. in the student lounge located in Marcus Hall.



Prof. appointed to psych. review board

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

Governor William Weld has appointed a University of Massachusetts professor to the Massachusetts Board of Registration of Psychologists.

Psychology professor Morton G. Harmatz, appointed in late November of 1994, will be responsible for licensing psychologists who appear before the board, and handling ethical violations as they arise.

"This is an opportunity to keep abreast on what's happening in the field," Harmatz said.

Licensing prospective psychologists includes reviewing applications and an examination of credentials, according to Susan Carson, clerk for the Board of Psychology.

Handling ethical violations entails investigation of individual complaints referred to the board, Carson said. The board decides if disciplinary measures should be taken, upon the completion of hearings for such cases.

"Those licensed [psychologists] who operate in an inappropriate manner will be brought before the board," Harmatz said.

After the hearing, the psychologist can be found innocent or negligent, Harmatz said. If found guilty, the board has the power to permanently revoke the license.

However, there are also "degrees in-between" innocence and guilt, Harmatz said.

Disciplinary measures could include supervised training for a year, or assigned courses to help the psychologist better understand the problem, Harmatz said. One such course cited by Harmatz that the board has recommended in the past was about women's issues.

Ilene Hoffer, deputy press secretary in Gov. Weld's office, cited Harmatz's "outstanding resume, extensive experience in the field of psychology and the glowing recommendations from people who worked closely with him."

Harmatz has been a faculty member of the UMass Psychology Department for 30 years. In 1964, he was an associate and assistant professor.

The board meets during the second Friday of every month, said Harmatz. The next one is scheduled for Feb. 10.

"I will be in Boston for one full day at least once a month," said Harmatz.

There are nine members of the board; seven psychologists and two lay members.

"My peers will be looking over my shoulders," said Harmatz, as he anticipates his commitment proceeding. "[Human] lives are involved."

Dr. Chuck Clifton, chair of the UMass Psychology Department, commended Harmatz's appointment and service to the university.

"We're very proud of it," said Clifton. "He's an important member of the faculty. He's done important research over the years. He's a long-term valued member of the faculty."

Nancy Kahn, a senior psychology major who has worked closely with Professor Harmatz as his teaching assistant, echoed Clifton's commendation.

"He's a really good professor," she said. "He's very knowledgeable in his field and he has kept lectures interesting for 400 people."

The appointment is a voluntary position and his term extends through August of 1999.

IRS gives advice to students who are facing a 'taxing' time

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Tax season is slowly approaching, and before students realize it not only will midterms and papers be due but so will their tax returns.

However, before students start filling out their tax forms, Michael Whiteman, accounting professor, and the Internal Revenue Service have some useful advice.

"Students shouldn't be in awe of the return," Whiteman says.

Whiteman recommends always filing before the deadline. According to Peggy Riley, IRS Public Affairs Specialist, tax returns are not due on the usual April 15, but rather April 18 because there is a three day weekend.

Using the correct form is vital, Whiteman said. He also advises following the instructions on the form accurately. The appropriate forms for students are either the simple W2 or 1040EZ. The 1040EZ is a simple form to follow, Riley said.

Students should ask parents whether or not they are being declared as a dependant, the professor said.

"If parents declare a student as a dependant then the student can't declare himself as a dependant," the professor said.

If a student claims himself or herself as a dependant, while their parents also claim them as a dependant, then an audit will probably ensue, the professor said. If an audit does not result, then there are good chances refunds will be delayed, Riley said.

Whiteman recommends parents declare students as dependant if they are in a high tax bracket.

Whiteman explained that a single student can take a deduction of $3,800, even if parents claim him or her as a dependant.

A student who claims himself or herself independent can not only deduct up to $3,800, but can claim another $2,450, Whiteman said.

Whiteman cited the example of a student who had a Summer job that paid $4,500. The student whose parents claimed him or her as a dependant has $700 worth of taxable income, while the independent student would have no taxable income.

Students who are single, and over 25 should investigate the earned income credit, the professor said.

"This is the first year the Earned Income Credit is offered to taxpayers without children," Riley said.

If students are baffled by filling out tax returns, they should consider taking accounting 371, Whiteman sarcastically said.

Gay rights activists take on GOP

By Kim I. Mills
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Gay rights activists are bracing for setbacks in the Republican-controlled Congress, their fears fueled by legislation introduced by Sen. Jesse Helms and promises of a hearing on schools and homosexuality.

"The early signs are not good, and the Republican leadership has a fundamental decision to make, and that is whether they are going to lead with hate and discrimination or with common sense," said Elizabeth Birch, executive director of the Human Rights Campaign Fund, the nation's largest gay lobby.

On the first day of the 104th Congress, Helms (R-N.C.) introduced a bill to stop government agencies from using taxpayer funds "to encourage its employees or officials to accept homosexuality as a legitimate or normal lifestyle."

He also dropped in a bill to protect federal employees from being fired for speaking out on their own time against the federal government's policies toward homosexuals.

Helms says the two bills are necessary because the Clinton administration has extended homosexuals "special rights in the federal workplace, rights not accorded to most other groups and individuals."

Earlier this month, House Speaker Newt Gingrich said he had promised the Rev. Lou Sheldon, head of the Traditional Values Coalition, a hearing on whether the federal government should provide money to school districts that "promote" homosexuality.

Sheldon, leader of the conservative national church network based in Anaheim, Calif., says he does not know how much federal money is spent for such purposes. But, he added, "It isn't so much the money as it is ... that the first- and second-largest school districts in America are promoting it — New York and Los Angeles."

Proposed bill to increase college funding

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) and State Rep. Ellen Story (D–Amherst) have presented a bill which aims to increase state funding to public higher education.

"The Commonwealth's public higher education system has experienced difficulty rebounding from the budget cutbacks it sustained during the state's fiscal crisis," said Rosenberg.

The goal of the bill is to increase state funding to public higher education and keep student tuition and fees stable. This will allow campus officials along with parents and students to plan for the future.

"The ability to plan is the difference between being in control and being in crisis," Rosenberg said. "This bill provides some powerful tools for regaining control of our higher education system and alleviating some of the anxiety students and parents must surely feel in the light of recent tuition hikes."

Rosenberg continues in the bill to address the lack of a state financing policy, the instability of current state funding and the increased tuition and fees handed to students to offset the lack of state funds. These combine to make the University of Massachusetts at Amherst among the second most expensive public universities in the nation.

"Student tuition and fee levels in Massachusetts are among the highest in the nation," said Rosenberg in the bill.

By adding an amendment to the fiscal 1994 budget, Rosenberg created the Task Force on Fair Share Funding. This 15–member panel scrutinized the relationship between states, students and families and pursued ways to make available the resources necessary for colleges and universities to keep the quality of education high while keeping public higher education available to the public.

To achieve this, the Higher Education Coordinating Council (HECC), a governing and coordinating body for all public higher education in the state, would approve a formula to be used by higher education institutions to determine their total resource needs each year.

Using fiscal 1994 funding levels, the Task Force projects the University of Massachusetts would be about $139 million short of its approximate need by fiscal year 1999.

The bill calls for the state to steadily increase its funding of higher public education until, by the year 2000, the student is paying one–third of the cost at the University and state colleges, and one–fourth at the community colleges.

Currently, students here pay 39 percent of the cost of education while the state pays 52 percent, said Joyce Hatch, budget director for the University.

The bill would also call for granting public educational institutions the authority to determine their own resource needs through formulas already approved by the HECC.

"[These formulas] now need to be codified and made permanent in the law," said Rosenberg in the bill.

Other aspects of the bill include developing performance indicators where the educational institutions can measure themselves against similar institutions in other states.

According to Rosenberg, this would require the Benchmark Study, a study of the states public higher education system by a national review board, to be conducted. The Benchmark study was authorized in 1991 by the Higher Education Reorganization Act, but was never implemented due to lack of funds.

"An unstable financing system and tuition hikes have made Massachusetts one of the most expensive states for public higher education," Rosenberg said. "This bill is aimed at implementing a financing policy, ensuring quality, holding campus officials accountable, and keeping higher education affordable."

Educators cautiously welcome Clinton's tuition tax credit plan

By Melissa B. Robinson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — College and university administrators are insisting President Clinton's proposal of up to $10,000 in tax deductions for people paying college tuition would not give schools an easy excuse to raise tuition.

"We're not going to do that, we're going to try to keep them at a reasonable level," said Sherry H. Penney, chancellor of the University of Massachusetts at Boston, who attended the meeting.

Overall, educators offered no guarantees that tuition and fees for higher education would not climb in the future. Many schools have been coping with greatly reduced state aid, declining enrollments and rising costs.

However, they said increases would not result from the Clinton plan, which has been proposed as part of a package to help the middle class. The income ceiling for the tax deduction would be $70,000 for a single-income family, and $100,000 for a two-income household, said Hunter R. Rawlings III, president of the University of Iowa.

On the contrary, college officials hoped such a deduction would help schools, either by boosting enrollment by making education more affordable, or, in the case of private schools, by reducing the amount of tuition revenues the schools must put toward financial aid.

The main question that concerns educators is whether such a tax break would come at the expense of current federal grant and loan programs, which colleges and universities want to hang on to at all costs. Educators said they received Clinton's assurance that the deduction will not be funded through such cuts.

Hemoperitoneum ruled as cause of student's death

The cause of death has been determined for Kevin G. Carroll, Jr., a former University of Massachusetts student who died in Amherst on October 3.

Carroll, 21, died from hemoperitoneum, according to the Springfield medical examiner's office.

The hemoperitoneum was caused by a torn splenic capsule, during a bout with infectious mononucleosis (mono), the medical examiners office said.

The spleen is an organ in the upper abdomen that is filled with blood. When one has mono, the spleen enlarges, and any kind of force can cause it to rupture, according to Dr. Loren Mednick of the Springfield examiners office.

The peritoneum is the lining inside of the abdomen. If the spleen ruptures, blood can enter this lining and render it hemoperitoneum, which causes death, a representative from Cooley–Dickinson said.

Carroll had been sick with mono for a week prior to his death, according to Scott Souva, one of Carroll's former roommates.

Carroll was found in his home, 1010 North Pleasant St., lying unconscious next to the telephone with the shower running in the other room, Souva said. His roommates believe he may have taken a fall because of a bruise and a scrape on his head.

Carroll had dialed 911, but was unable to give his full address, Souva said. He was pronounced dead upon arrival at Cooley–Dickinson.

■ Faculty, politicians angered by Gov. Weld's pay-raise rejection

"Charles Baker is new at his position — he's testing the waters," Story said. "He wants to start out tough, so everyone knows not to expect much."

Walter Denny, an art history professor at UMass, also said Weld's actions were politically motivated.

"Weld is trying to improve his Right–wing credentials," said Denny. "He doesn't look Right–wing enough, so what better thing to do than to cut the salaries at the big university? Don't think for one minute Baker's decision had anything to do with education; it was made purely on political motives."

Baker wrote in his letter that the proposed contract would increase salaries and put limitations on the number of hours faculty could spend in the classroom. Through his research, he has concluded that such actions would not improve the university's academic standing.

He went on to cite data he and his staff had done on comparative salaries of other universities throughout the country, stating that Massachusetts' full–time faculty's salaries are 6.7 percent higher than the national average of public universities, rendering salary increases unjustifiable."

In a letter to UMass faculty, Hooker expressed his regret, disagreed with Baker's analysis and defended his proposal. By presenting a more modest salary package, Hooker said, the faculty's worth would have been undervalued.

"When salaries are adjusted for cost–of–living, our faculty is significantly underpaid relative to our peers," Hooker said.

According to Denny, Baker used inaccurate and out–of– date data for his research and Baker has no idea what it is like to teach at UMass.

"Mr. Baker obviously has no idea what kind of hardships we have here," said Denny. "I have used 15–20 percent of my own salary, for the past 11 years, just to subsidize my own job."

Denny said he has paid for books, equipment and such things as long distance phone calls and supplies that he said most schools provide.

"I invited both Weld and Baker to come out and live with me for a week and see what the job is like," said Denny. "I doubt that is going to happen."

Chancellor David K. Scott sent Hooker a letter detailing several of Bakers inaccuracies he had observed.

In the question of salary placement rclative to schools on a national scale, Scott noted that UMass only ranks 26 out of the 39 public Research I universities who, Scott said, are the institutions UMass is in true competition for faculty with.

In Baker's letter, he stated that Hooker's proposed contract would factor in time spent on research, resulting in UMass faculty averaging six to nine hours a week in the classroom.

"Baker is implying that the amount of time teachers spend in the classroom is equal to the amount of work they do, which is not the case," Story said.

According to the Senate Post Audit and Oversight Committee, UMass faculty spent and average of 7.1 hours in the classroom weekly in 1992, and 23.7 hours of work outside the classroom.

This demonstrates the administration's lack of understanding of higher education, according to State Representative Stan Rosenburg, D–Amherst.

According to Richards, Baker was wrong to compare UMass with a variety of universities which prioritize different elements of education.

Instead, Baker should have looked at universities similar to UMass, such as other land grant institutions that also emphasize research heavily, Richards said.

Land grant institutions, established in the Civil War, are universities that have both agricultural and military preparedness programs, Richards said.

"UMass, for instance, is not comparable to a community college in East Georgia," Richards said.

Denny said it is important to compare UMass with other land grant schools because, like UMass, they are designed to be the flagship schools of the state.

"Compared to other Research I schools, what UMass is trying to be, [faculty] is a lot worse off," Denny said.

Following the rejection of salary raises, the Weld administration presented its budget proposal last week, which would cut $10 million from higher education at public institutions.

Richards is encouraging students, alumni and community to write letters to the governor in disapproval of his decisions.

Hooker said that after all of the budget cuts UMass has seen over the years, "the fact that a quality education continues to be delivered to UMass students is a testament to the faculty."

Physical Plant seeks new director

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Physical Plant is seeking a new permanent director after its director of six years recently stepped down.

Pete Wozniak, former director of the Physical Plant, stepped down to oversee construction of a co–generation plant at the University.

He has been temporarily replaced by acting director Pat Daly who will serve as director until a permanent replacement is found. Daly was previously director of operations and utilities at the Physical Plant.

Previous to Wozniak's resignation, four out–of–state consultants reviewed the UMass Physical Plant and put together a 100–page report on their findings. The report is, as of yet, not been released.

The reorganization was announced by William Rose, associate vice chancellor for facilities and campus services.

Rose said this was neither a promotion or a demotion, but described the move as "a step sideways."

When making the announcement, Rose applauded Wozniak's commitment to the University during the past 26 years, particularly during his tenure as director.

"Pete has initiated the process of transforming the Physical Plant Division into a state–of–the–art, customer–focused facilities organization," Rose said. "I have appreciated Pete's dedication and professionalism."

Dave Mitchell, president of the University workers' union, and an electrician at the Physical Plant, said during Wozniak's tenure as director, the plant had problems with management.

"We believe that there are a lot of good managers down at the plant," said Mitchell, "but we believe that the plant is poorly managed."

Mitchell, who has worked at the plant for over nine years, worked in the plant previous to Wozniak becoming director.

"Things did not improve," Mitchell said. "Pete had to deal with budget cuts and mismanagement."

Mitchell said the union receives many complaints from the plant workers.

"We file a lot of grievances down there," Mitchell said.

Mitchell expressed doubts that a new director will ease the plant's troubles.

"We're hoping that there are going to be some positive changes," Mitchell said. "As a union and as employees, we look forward to that but we have grave doubts as to whether or not that is going to happen."

According to Mitchell, the plant management recently opened discussion with the employees in an effort to better manage the plant.

"We do see an opening between union leadership and management on both sides," said Rose. "We both must be willing to participate in the increasing dialogue."

Rose said a request for proposals for the co–generation facility were released Dec. 18 with responses due in mid–April. Construction is to begin within the calendar year, said Rose.

Daly joined the University as director of engineering in October 1987 and was named director of operations and utilities in February 1989. Previously, he was director of engineering at Industronics, a manufacturer of incinerator equipment in South Windsor, Conn.

Daly was unavailable for comment.

The Physical Plant director currently oversees a budget of about $31 million and approximately 600 employees.

Gilbert gives housing new direction

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

A new addition to the University of Massachusetts housing services is working to serve an increasingly diverse student body by putting their ideas into motion.

Michael Gilbert, associate director of Housing Services, has supported programs accommodating students who live in the dormitories, since his October appointment.

"We step back and say 'What are students like?'" he said. "What do students need?"

Gilbert said he supports a variety of programs, including those which help students develop effective study skills, become aware of the University's multiculturalism and become comfortable talking about their individual differences.

Gilbert said he holds a special place for freshmen who upon coming to campus and a new setting, typically ask "who are my friends? Who will like me?"

"In this environment, people are very different," Gilbert said. "Students should look at friends other than good or bad. We should build upon similarities, appreciate and learn from the difference."

Gilbert works closely with some of the 23 different residence directors, has met with some of the 360 residents assistants and hopes to meet more, he said

"We [the entire residence staff] want to expose people to new ideas and to assist them comfortably and appropriately as they interact with different people," he said.

UMass has the capacity to house up to approximately 11,000 students, he said, and his goal is to provide for their academic pursuits.

Bonita Harvey, residence director of Cashin Residence Hall in the Sylvan Area, is one staff member pleased with Gilbert's efforts.

"He's very positive," she said. "He knows the direction he's going and he has incredible vision. He has set a time for all of us and we will be getting more programs and having more say."

Gilbert worked as a residence director at Illinois State University in Chicago from 1981 until 1983. There he was responsible for a building which housed 800 residents.

He then moved on to the University of Wisconsin at Madison where he was the student affairs coordinator until 1985.

In 1985, Gilbert moved on to North Carolina State University at Raleigh where he was the assistant director of resident life.

Northeastern University in Boston was the next stop, where Gilbert was the associate director of residence life from 1987 until last October, when he joined the administrative staff of UMass.

Gilbert is three months into his tenure, and he commended his staff as "talented, motivated and committed."

Gilbert said he is looking forward to improving the efforts of Housing Services. He met Monday evening last semester, as he will this semester, with housing area student governments leaders. The meetings are with the presidents, vice presidents, treasurers and secretaries.

"I am welcoming continued work with staff, including programming and training so we can do our jobs better," he said.

New computer program aids job search

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Seniors searching for jobs when they graduate have a convenient way of doing it through the Mather Career Center's Electronic Resume Referral.

The Career Center offers seniors and alumni the Resume Expert Plus program for the IBM Personal Computers and computers that are compatible with them.

Resume Expert Plus allows students to produce high–quality resumes, which are down–loaded into the Career Center's database, according to Karen Knight, Associate Director of Employer Relations.

"It allows for a student's resume to be matched with positions that come in," Knight said. The service costs $20.

The Career Center tries to accommodate people from all majors, but there are not always jobs available for every major, Knight said. The positions on this system tend to lean towards technical majors and management majors.

The employment listings are done monthly, and employers re–enter the program cyclically to find a resume which matches their requirements, Knight said.

After a resume has been matched with a position, the Career Center will then fax it to the employer, according to Jacquelyn Mauer, Employment Referral Specialist.

Many of the positions on the system are immediate, Knight said.

"In addition to their own networking, [students] should be using this system," Knight said.

Various businesses use the system to find new employees for various positions, Knight said. However, many of the businesses that use the system are small.

"The employers that list can not afford to come to campus," Knight said.

The resume can easily be constructed from various simple command menus, according to Mauer.

The software differs from traditional word processors because of the menus, and the referral system which word processors lack, Knight said.

This software is widely used at various universities and colleges across the nation, Knight said.

If students do not have a Personal Computer they can reserve time on one of the Career Center's computers.

UM to host celebration of Latino culture

'Al Nuevo Mundo' aims to open doors between diverse multicultural societies

By Hernan Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

As part of new efforts to reach out to the Hispanic community, the University of Massachusetts, in conjunction with various supporting groups and organizations, is putting together a series of events to expose and promote the Latino culture.

The extensive cultural series, "Al Nuevo Mundo" ("To the New World"), is set to begin during the spring of 1996 and will run for approximately three years.

According to the program's draft brochure, the title is an indicator of what the project intends to uncover — namely the conceptualization of a world which was not new to non–Europeans who previously inhabited it.

"Al Nuevo Mundo" will emphasize the recognition and celebration of new cultures emerging in the Americas from European, African and Indigenous peoples.

Javier Cevallos, faculty advisor to the UMass provost and professor in the department of Spanish and Portuguese, said a key goal is "to open doors that have historically been closed between the University and the Latino community, between different Latino cultures, and between U.S. Latinos and Latin countries in the Americas."

The project "celebrates these new cultures by setting forth To the New World, a world based on the richness and diversity of Latin American and Latino cultures. We recognize the pain and disappointments of the past, while we look forward to a new process of discovery through opening doors To the New World."

One of the principal objectives is to draw a connection between the University and various other Latino organizations throughout the area and all across the state. With a wide array of locations, events may be simultaneously held on and as well as off academic settings.

"Latinos are the largest minority in Massachusetts . . . but in the past, this diverse and dynamic group has not played its rightful role in the life of the University of Massachusetts [and throughout the rest of the state]," states the draft brochure.

"Al Nuevo Mundo," intended to be immense in its proportions, is already undergoing an exhaustive planning process, Cevallos said.

There is already a six–month plan set out prior to the inauguration of the series. Following this, a full year of fund–raising will take place, which will actually determine the diversity and quantity of events, Cevallos said.

In order for this preparation process to function effectively, the University will be hiring a full–time community organizer who will take charge in establishing positive working relations between the University and the many groups involved.

As part of the cultural diversity the project aims to display, many personalities from the Latino community within and outside of the United States are scheduled to appear. There is already a verbal commitment from Columbia writer Gabriel Garcia Marquez. Marquez won the Nobel Price for literature in 1982.

Marquez will actually be staying at the University in April 1996 as part of an 'extended residency' of two to four weeks that furms part of his contribution to the series, according to Cevallos.

In addition, the three–year Latino cultural celebration expects to sponsor a film–lecture tour by Laura Esquivel, the Mexican novelist who was author of Like Water for Chocolate. Esquivel is scheduled to arrive in October 1996.

Participants want Latino groups, not the University, to direct programming

By Hernan Rozemberg

"Al Nuevo Mundo" was inaugurated this past fall during an art exhibition by Leonel Gongora, but its first meeting to plan for the three year project occurred in late January.

The first organizational conference, with over 20 local community groups present, was held Jan. 20 in the Bank of Boston building in Springfield. Among those present were represcntatives of the University of Massachusetts, sponsor of the project, along with participating Latino groups.

Nancy Perry, deputy director of the Institute for Advanced Study in the Humanities was present to represent the main University organizational body. Javier Cevallos, faculty advisor to the provost, represented the administrative side.

Some of the many community organizations sharing in the event included the Puerto Rican Cultural Center in Springfield, Casa Latina from Northampton, Nueva Esperanza from Holyoke and El Centro Las Americas of Worcester.

Cevallos and Perry both agreed this project is not to be directed by the University, but rather by the community groups themselves. Cevallos said the administration is there "to work with the community, not for the community" and that he was there to "coordinate, not dictate" the progress of the project.

Perry agreed, making it clear this type of working environment between the University and diversity groups is a new way of giving the Latino community a voice of their own.

"From what I understand, this type of collaboration has never been done before," she said.

This collaborative effort seems to be an essential base to the positive advancement of the series. An initial concern raised at the conference raised by the smaller groups was that the University may have already gone too far without their consultation.

Cevallos made it clear the ideas achieved so far are only possibilities and not at all final decisions.

"There is no hidden agenda," he said.

Juan Gerena, executive director of the Puerto Rican Cultural Center, said he was satisfaction with the University's communal approach to the project, since previously all the work was already planned and finalized before reaching his desk.

Gerena said among many expectations, a priority for the project should be to work as an incentive for education for young Latinos. For example, he said, the presence of Colombian writer Gabriel Garcia Marquez should induce youngsters "to take up the pen instead of the gun."

Will Echevarria, executive director of Casa Latina, said he also appreciated the University's initiative to begin this project, but said the leadership must come from the Latino community organizations. Latinos must take over its direction since "we are the ones who determine what the final process will be," he said.

According to Cevallos, this first conference led to the creation of an organizational committee made up of the University's representatives and the multi–party Latino community.

The planning process is to continue for approximately four months, which will be followed by an fervent fund–raising period whereby a tentative estimate of $500,000 is hoped to be raised, said Cevallos.

Overloaded K12 system could affect subscribers

System overload — access denied.

Users of the UMassK12 computer system may need to relocate because of an "overload situation" — to computer networks at the University of Massachusetts at Lowell.

UMassK12 is a system developed at UMass Amherst which offers free, menued Internet computer accounts, including educational programs and other resources to students and teachers in grades kindergarten through 12, according to Helen Sternheim, director of user support.

"We are in a gridlock situation," Sternheim said, "and are no longer issuing accounts to applicants outside the 413 area code. They are referred to UMass Lowell and UMass Boston."

According to Sternheim, an account on the UMassK12 system opens users to a world of educational resources.

"Users can access library catalogs, all of Shakespeare is on line, you can even find the weather forecast," she said.

Programs for students range from math and science to skiing and guitars.

"There are pen pal networks and even special programs for different age groups."

The system's popularity may be due, in part, to the fact that it is free and easy to use.

"The accounts are different from other accounts because it is a menued system," Sternheim said. "The menu tells the user exactly what to do, which makes it easier for anyone to use."

The system has grown rapidly since its introduction a year and a half ago by Helen Sternheim and her husband, Mort Sternheim, a professor of physics at UMass.

"Trying to get users on the system used to be like pulling teeth," Sternheim said.

But after demonstrations and workshops, the word got .ut and the popularity of the system grew — so much that it is approaching overload, which results in less effectiveness.

"The system is slow and mail gets backed up," Sternheim said.

According to Sternheim, the University purchased the main computer for the project, and it stays alive with various grant money.

A regular computer account like the K12 system would cost a UMass student $20 for 20 hours of user time per month, but UMassK12 is funded by the University, and other grants such as middle school teacher enhancement grants, she said.

"We are currently looking for other funding," Sternheim said. "I can't predict the future, but hopefully we will be able to manage."

Advising now more personalized

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

The College of Arts and Science (CASIAC) Information and Advising Center recently made changes in an attempt to groom services for students' personal needs.

University of Massachusetts Students will now have access to a consistent personal advisor and career counseling through CASIAC in conjunction with the Mather Career Center, according to Elizabeth Teagan, a CASIAC advisor.

"We are trying to assign advisors to each student," said Linda Rooney, CASIAC head of advising.

Before this year, students were not assigned a regular advisor. Now all undeclared and pre–majors, as well as those on academic probation, will be assigned advisors, Rooney said.

The University has added more advisors, after experimenting last semester by adding four new graduate students as advisors, Rooney said.

Rooney said the expanded staff is a main contributor of a substantial drop in suspensions last semester.

Because the additional advisors were successful, the University will be increasing the number of non–faculty advisors to seven, in addition to the 16 faculty advisors, Rooney said.

"Our basic job is to guide the undeclared students," Rooney said. However, she said at times advisors can be detrimental in helping undeclared students choose majors.

Teagan said that many students come to the University without any idea of what they want to study. She said advisors help students realize their potential.

CASIAC is planning to experiment with other innovative advising techniques as well.

CASIAC has recently established a program with the Mather Career Center to help students who have majors and are interested in career choices, Teagan said.

Starting Feb. 9, a career center advisor will be at CASIAC offices every Thursday afternoon to counsel students on career opportunities.

The advisor will hold a career anxiety workshop and provide information about the field experience program, Teagan said.

CASIAC will have a table set up at the campus center concourse starting today where students can receive walk–through advising, Teagan said.

Test will access aptitude for grad. schools

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Seniors interested in graduate school may want to take a test drive before plunging into the entrance exams and applications.

On Feb. 25, Kaplan will be holding a national test drive for students who are interested in taking any of the standardize tests necessary for graduate schools, such as the GRE, LSAT, MCAT or GMAT.

"The tests help determine whether students have the aptitude to go further," Dean Graziano, director of Kaplan in Amherst said.

Graziano said the tests are an actual diagnostic.

There are no costs or any obligations.

Kaplan, one of the nation's largest test preparation companies, offers various courses to assist students with standardized tests.

The tests can assist students in determining whether they need assistance preparing for the exams, Graziano said.

Kaplan will also provide the students with a computer analysis of their performance. The results of the computer analysis will be provided to the students a few days after the test day, Graziano said.

The testing will be held on the various campuses throughout Massachusetts and the nation, Graziano said.

"There is limited seating, so students should call for reservations," Graziano said. Any student who shows up without a reservation will have to be turned away.

In conjunction with Kaplan's test drive, Gov. William F. Weld recently proclaimed Feb. 25 as Student Preparedness Day. Graziano helped author the proclamation.

"[Graziano] requested that the governor proclaim Feb. 25 as Student Preparedness Day, and he was happy to oblige," Pamela Jonah, spokesperson for the governor, said.

The state has no plans for Student Preparedness Day, Jonah said.

Anyone wishing to make reservations for the testing should call 1–800–KAP–TEST.

The Collegian Business Desk is looking for writers.

Anyone interested should come to the Collegian office and talk with Matt Wurtzel.

No prior experience is necessary.

Two profs. promoted to top positions

By Chris Hassett
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts professors were recently promoted to the top positions within the computer and electrical engineering department.

Professor Daniel H. Shaubert, a 12–year UMass veteran, and Associate Professor Christopher V. Hollot, who has been at UMass since 1984, were named to head and assistant head of the department, respectively.

"I look forward to further developing the department's external research funding program," Schaubert said.

Hollot's new position will focus on academic affairs within the department.

Shaubert teaches undergraduate and graduate courses in electromagnetic analysis, microwave circuits and components, and radar systems.

Shaubert's plans for the department include increasing research in areas of electronic technology such as telecommunications, remote sensing and electronic manufacturing.

Before joining the UMass faculty, Shaubert worked as the lead scientist for the analysis of electromagnetic problems for the National Center for Devices and Radiological Health of the Food and Drug Administration in Rockville, Md.

Recipient of the Ried Memorial Award and the Sustained Superior Performance Award, Shaubert holds several U.S. patents. He has several current research interests, including printed circuit antenna design and analysis, millimeter wave antennas and components, scattering and absorption by dielectric and metallic bodies and antenna scattering characteristics for transient applications.

Hollot has research interests in the area of systems and control.

Hollot received his Bachelors Degree in Electrical engineering in 1974 at West Virginia University in Morgantown. He received his masters at Syracuse University, and his doctorate at the University of Rochester.

Hallot received the IEEN Outstanding Young Faculty Award in 1987, the NSF Presidential Young Investigator Award in 1988 and the Outstanding Advisor Service Award of the UMass College of Engineering in 1993. He also received a NATO Senior Guest Fellowship in 1992.

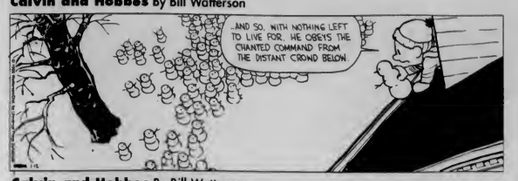
Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson



Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson

WHY DOES MAN CREATE?
IS IT MAN'S PURPOSE ON EARTH TO EXPRESS HIMSELF, TO BRING FORM TO THOUGHT, AND TO DISCOVER MEANING IN EXPERIENCE?
OR IS IT JUST SOMETHING TO DO WHEN HE'S BORED?

Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson

Bruno By C. Baldwin

THE MAIN PROBLEM WITH THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IS THEY'VE SIMPLY MUTILATED THE TEACHINGS OF CHRIST. THEY SHOULD GO BACK AND REALLY LOOK AT WHAT THE ORIGINAL SCRIPTURES SAID, AND WHAT HE SAID.
BUT I THINK THE ACTUAL MAIN PROBLEM IS THAT THEY TRY TO GET CONVERTS, WHICH MEANS THAT THEY'VE HAD TO CHANGE WITH THE TIMES, WHICH DESTROYS THE FOUNDATION OF RELIGION WHICH IS ETERNAL TRUTH. THEY SHOULD REVERT TO THEIR ORIGINAL NATURE FOR MEMBERS.
WILL YOU LET THE CATHOLICS DO WHATEVER THE FUCK THEY WANT? ANYTIME AT ALL? THE ABSENCE OF THE CELIBACY CLAUSE?
AND EASTER!
WHO CARES THAT THEY HAVE ISN'T THE FACT THAT THEY'VE BEEN KILLING PEOPLE IN THE NAME OF GOD FOR CENTURIES ENOUGH TO NOT SEEM TO RE-JUSTIFY THEIR ESTABLISHMENT?

Jim's Journal By Jim

I was trying to open my window today to get a little breeze.
But it wouldn't stay open by itself.
So I put a book under it to hold it open.
Then Mr. Peterson and I just looked out the window for a while.

Jim's Journal By Jim

I went to a gift shop with Ruth today.
She bought a calendar with pictures of puppies and kittens on it.
"They're so cute," she said. "I just love 'em!"
She told me she almost got the "Rear View" calendar.

Jim's Journal By Jim

Tony came by today to tell me he had a girlfriend.
"I really think this is it, Jim. I think I'm in love," he said.
I asked him what her name was and he said, "Jaime—I mean Jill. Jay Jill."
He realized how funny it was to stumble on the word. "Yeah, duh- I can't even say her name," he said.

ZEFFLER'S GARAGE

The guys down at Zeffler's Garage were having hours of fun with the remote-control squeal device they had hidden in Mrs. Lambert's car.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Play it smart today. Avoid compromising or unreliable situations. A schedule revision should allow for both a love life and career commitments. Strive to eliminate competition via close relationships.

TAURUS (April 20 - May 20) Take care of routine matters early in the day. Your ingenuity will help make up for a cash shortage. Revising an old project boosts profits. An older person offers you excellent advice, follow it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) You could receive several interesting offers today. Now the question is which one to accept. Weigh the pros and cons carefully. Your romantic partner could offer wonderful insights.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Study your financial situation if you treat a guilty-looking to a budget will make money worries a thing of the past. A golden opportunity will entail some sacrifice.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Hold yourself in check when you feel the urge to sound off. Move ahead with changes correcting any errors that you spot. A new admirer may show appreciation in an unusual way. Be candid.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Trying too hard to anticipate someone's moves could be boomerang. Listen carefully and file your observations away for further thought. Avoid making too many demands on loved ones.

Resentment will grow if you act quirky.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Your schiller heal could be overdependence on that special someone. Guard against becoming a clinging one. Letting go of a defeatist attitude will make you a winner. Live in the present, not the past.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Moderation is essential now. Resist an urge to throw caution to the wind. You limit yourself more romantically inclined than usual tonight. Dine at an intimate candlelit restaurant. Make will applaud a sentimental gesture.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Substantial progress can be made if you continue to forge ahead in a steady fashion. Take things one step at a time for optimum results. A calm manner is vital when dealing with important people.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Conversations with bankers or lawyers will be helpful. Maintain a low profile in your personal relationships. If feeling stressed out, pamper yourself with extra rest. Spending the evening with upbeat friends will buoy your spirits.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Unexpected support from higher-ups or associates allows you to go forward with a creative project. Strive to keep the atmosphere at home cheerful. Bringing up controversial subjects would not be smart.

*Deferred Apple Computer Loan offer expires February 17, 1995. No payments of interest or principal will be required for 90 days. (Some resellers may require a deposit to hold merchandise while loan is being approved.) Interest accruing during this 90-day period will be added to principal, and the principal amount, as so increased, will thereafter bear interest which will be included in the repayment schedule. †Monthly payment is an estimate based on the following information. For the Performa® 475 system shown here, a purchase price of $1,185.45, which includes 5% sales tax, including loan fee, the total loan amount is $1,254.44 which results in a monthly payment obligation of $22. For the Performa® 636 CD system shown here, a purchase price of $1,815.45, which includes 5% sales tax, including loan fee, the total loan amount is $1,921.11, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $33. For the Power Macintosh® 7100/66 CD system shown here, a purchase price of $3,463.95, which includes 5% sales tax, including loan fee, the total loan amount is $3,665.56, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $61. Computer system prices, loan amounts and sales taxes may vary. See your authorized Apple Campus Reseller or representative for current system prices, loans and tax amounts. Loans are for a minimum of $1,000 to a maximum of $10,000. You may take out more than one loan, but the total of all loans cannot exceed $10,000 annually. A 5% loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount. The interest rate is variable, based on the commercial paper rate plus 5.35%. For the month of November, 1994, the interest rate was 10.85% with an Annual Percentage Rate of 12.10%. 8-year loan term with no prepayment penalty. The monthly payment and the Annual Percentage Rate shown assume the 90-day deferment of principal and interest described above and no other deferment of principal or interest. Students may defer principal payments up to 4 years, or until graduation. Deferment will change your monthly payments. The Apple Computer Loan is subject to credit approval. Apple Computer Loan and 90-Day Deferred Payment Plan offers available only to qualifying students, faculty and staff. The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team had an exciting winter break as the Minutemen won games, renewed a rivalry, set records, and even had the opportunity to visit Europe.

The winter break started in an unlikely location for the Minutemen as they boarded the Concorde to head to the Buckler Christmas Challenge in Strasbourg, France.

The tournament was not a success in terms of wins and losses — the Minutemen went 0-3 in the exhibition games — but according to Coach John Calipari, there was still plenty to be gained from the trip.

"They are playing a game they would not have experienced on the college circuit," he said. "They will come back stronger and wiser."

Following the trip, UMass returned to the United States to begin its Atlantic 10 schedule against the West Virginia Mountaineers in the Abdow's Classic, where the Minutemen beat West Virginia 95-65.

After a close victory over Saint Louis in front of the largest ever crowd for basketball in the state of Missouri, the team headed to Atlantic City, where senior Lou Roe got a chance to compete in his home city.

Three days later, the Minutemen got a scare from St. Bonaventure as the improving Bonnies forced the Minutemen into overtime.

The Minutemen returned to the No. 1 spot in the Associated Press and USA Today/CNN polls following losses by North Carolina, UCLA and Arkansas. UMass remained No. 1 at Collegian press time, heading into games against A-10 rivals West Virginia and St. Bonaventure.

Despite being 18-point underdogs, the Temple Owls came to the William D. Mullins Center and proved that despite the loss of two NBA first round draft choices, the rivalry between the Owls and Minutemen still runs strong, as the two teams excited the Mullins Center crowd once again.

Massachusetts ice hockey on an upswing

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

As the 1994 fall semester ended, the University of Massachusetts hockey team was left winless. With the start of a new semester, UMass (4-16-2, 2-11 in HE) has registered four wins and is beginning to make some noise in its inaugural season in Hockey East.

The long-awaited first victory of the season came against Notre Dame Dec. 31, 1994 at the William D. Mullins Center. The game winner was an overtime goal from Warren Norris off a great setup from Rob Bonneau, giving UMass a 4-3 victory.

After an 8-4 loss to Boston College, the Minutemen rebounded with a 5-3 win over BC at Mullins Jan. 7. The crowd of 5,492 celebrated UMass' first ever conference victory. Sal Manganaro had two goals and Tom Perry had three assists as Dave Kilduff picked up the win in net with 32 saves. Bonneau was named HE Player of the Week Jan. 9 for his three-goal, one assists performance in the BC series.

Another milestone was attained Jan. 20 as UMass registered its first Hockey East road win at Providence. The Minutemen stunned the Friars at the Schneider Arena in front of a scant crowd of 1,023.

Kilduff got the win in net when he relieved an injured Brian Regan, making 35 saves in a 7-3 romp. Bonneau and Manganaro continued their hot streak with two goals each.

The Minutemen picked up win No. 4 Jan. 24 over Army. Rich Moriarty recorded his win in goal with 20 saves. The Minutemen needed a third period comeback to defeat the Cadets, with Tiger Holland scoring the game winner after a Tom Perry goal tied it.

Statistics compiled through Jan. 26

Break brings more wins for women's basketball

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has come to life over the break. After starting the season with five straight losses, two of them by one point, the Minutewomen have rung off nine victories in their last 10 games to improve their record to 9-6.

Along the way, they won six straight, the longest winning streak during Coach Joanie O'Brien's four years at UMass.

During the streak, the Minutewomen beat Providence (64-52), St. Peter's (63-40), Vermont (65-46), Temple (65-59), St. Bonaventure (75-58) and Rutgers (78-67).

The Minutewomen have never beaten the defending Atlantic 10 Champion Lady Knights in 23 tries, and actually were down by 14 at the half before they started to light it up in the second half, shooting 64.3 percent from the field.

The winning streak was halted at the hands of A-10 foe George Washington (69-60), who was ranked No. 16 nationally at the time.

The Minutewomen are off to their best start ever in the A-10 at 4-1 and are tied for first with George Washington by virtue of Rutgers' upset of the Colonial Women Jan. 22 (75-74).

A big reason why UMass has won nine of its last 10 games has been its balanced scoring. The Minutewomen have had at least two players in double figures in every one of its 10-game stretch. Three times, they had three players in double figures and four times they had four players in double figures.

The two juniors, Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile, have been leading the way. Thomas is the team's leading scorer and recently scored her 1,000th career point, while Gurile is the team leader in blocks and is the second leading scorer. She is just 17 points away from her 1,000th point.

Sophomore Beth Kozmeski set a school record against Dartmouth last week by nailing seven three-pointers.

All stats as of Jan. 27.

Wins starting to come for Minutemen

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

"We're getting closer" became a popular refrain for University of Massachusetts hockey Coach Joe Mallen as his club languished toward an 0-13-1 opening to its first season in the formidable Hockey East conference.

On Dec. 31, 1994, the Minutemen finally got there, beating Notre Dame 4-3 in overtime. From that day, UMass has earned a respectable 4-3-1, proof the team has fervently sought and made improvement.

A team is only as good as its personnel, and while the youth that permeates the UMass roster has prevented it from making a serious dent in the conference race, the constant lineup adjustments have brought UMass to where they are.

Key additions

By the 12th outing of the year, a 6-3 loss to New Hampshire in Manchester, Mallen saw three of his players — Blair Manning, Josh Hockstra and Rich Alger — depart the program. That opened the door for two experienced skaters, sophomore defenseman Dale Hooper and junior forward/Boston University transfer Jon Jacques, who walked back into college hockey and brought a lot of talent and poise with them.

"[Jacques] has a lot of experience [at Boston University], a lot of speed, and a lot of skill," Mallen said.

Hooper's return after a semester of academic trouble bolstered the Minuteman blueline that was potentially reeling following Alger's exit.

No mention of the 6-foot-2, 190-pound Rye, N.H. native is found in the team media guide, and several members of the small journalistic entourage that covers the team forgot what brand of play he would immediately inject into UMass' game plan.

It is not uncommon for a coach at any level to alter his forward lines and defensive pairings, often in the middle of a game. But no one can deny that it is often far more rewarding to settle on more constant trios and tandems, which UMass has finally been able to do without fear of ineffectiveness.

Though the statistics have yet to reflect it, the Minuteman power play is now run by two units, those of Rob Bonneau, Sal Manganaro and Dean Campanale, and Warren Norris, Jacques and Tom Perry. Both have shown a knack for making the extra pass and getting the good shot during the man advantage.

Powerplay key to wins

"[Sal's] taken the things he's been coached and put a lot of hard work in to them," Mallen said. "He's become a heck of a player."

In its two conference wins, UMass' powerplay was a lethal 4-of-9, demonstrating that when the Minutemen convert in 5-on-4 situations, they are an unquestionably worthy opponent.

The speed and passing prowess of Managanaro and Bonneau have evoked images of some of the great duos to skate in this league.

It was no mystery in the preseason that UMass was working with three college caliber goalies, a boast few programs can make. But only recently have all three done their best work. Seldom-used Rich Moriarty justified Mallen's decision to start him against Army when he failed the Cadets as he did one year ago in UMass' first ever defeat of a Division I team.

Dave Kilduff gained notoriety for temporarily setting a Hockey East save record (50) versus Boston University on Nov. 18, 1994, but too many goals he allowed in that and several other games were of the soft variety.

However, in UMass' wins against Boston College and Providence, Kilduff played to his fullest potential. He was instrumental in the emotional defeat of the Eagles, whose ties to the Minutemen run deep through Manganaro and Mallen (a former BC assistant), and he stepped into the demolition of the Friars without any expectation to play. He made 32 and 35 saves in those victories, respectively.

Freshman earns first win

And then there is Regan, who is most pressured due to his youth and his status in the Hartford Whalers' organization. At times it has been obvious how far removed the Milford, Conn., native is from a shot at the big time.

But he was the man who shook the monkey from UMass' back, earning the precious first victory, and he was impressive in a losing cause in the third game of the season with Providence (29 saves).

Regan's style is perhaps most conducive to UMass' success, since he frequently ties up the puck near the net, preventing opponents from jumping on rebounds as inexperienced clubs often allow their competition to do. Regan is comfortable with many faceoffs coming on both sides of him, as UMass has excellent drawtakers in Evans and Norris.

Black Bears shine atop HE

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

A lot has changed in Hockey East over the past month but one thing remains the same: The Maine Black Bears are still on top. Pre-season favorite Boston University has also made its move on the top spot recently.

Hockey East continues to stake its claim as one of the nation's finest conferences as three teams figure into the national Top 10 poll. Maine sits atop, with BU at third and New Hampshire 10th in the poll released on Jan. 23.

Heading into consecutive weekend contests against the University of Massachusetts (Jan. 27-28), Maine has an impressive 9-0-6 record in conference play. Overall, Shawn Walsh's club has a 21-1-6 record with the lone loss Dec. 23 against Princeton, good for 58 points in the conference standings.

The backbone of the squad has been goaltender Blair Allison, who has a 2.51 goals against average coupled with a .892 save percentage in 28 games. He has been in net for every Maine victory. In HE play, three defensemen are key for Maine, as Jeff Tory (3 goals, 16 assists, 19 points), jacque Rodrigue (6-7-13) and Chris Imes (2-11-13) have contributed offensively.

What's hot

As of press time, BU was red-hot to climb within five points of Maine. The Terriers, 9-1 since Dec. 7, have been led all year long by power forward Mike Grier, the conference's second leading scorer. Grier has 21 goals in 21 games, racking up 37 total points.

Two strong goaltenders in Derek Herlofsky (3.00 GAA, .857 save percentage) and Tom Noble (2.63 GAA, .880) pace BU. The advantage the Terriers may have in the fight for first is depth in goal with this combination of currently the third and fourth best goalies statistically.

It is no coincidence that UNH would round out the top three in the standings with the second best goalie so far in Mike Heinke (2.64, .911). Eric Flinton (16-16-32) leads a very potent attack that has scored the second most goals to BU. The Wildcats have a firm grip on third place with 46 points.

Next up in the HE standings is UMass-Lowell with 38 points. The River Hawks are led by Greg Bullock, who leads all of college hockey with 49 points in 25 games. The sophomore forward has been named player of the week three times. In a strange trend over its past three HE home-and- home series, Lowell has lost all three of its home games while winning all three on the road.

Huskies disappointing

Battling the River Hawks for fourth place are the Northeastern Huskies. The Huskies have been a bit of a disappointment, but they have the season series with Maine and BU out of the way and end the season with three games against last-place UMass. Jordon Shields (12-20-32) leads the way offensively, picking up for slumping J.F. Aube. Aube does have 13 goals overall (22 points), but more is expected from the first team pre-season All-HE selection.

If the Huskies are disappointing, then Merrimack is the surprise. The Warriors are in sixth place with 31 points, doing it with defense and streaky goaltending. Martin Legault and Eric Thibeault don't have stellar numbers, but each have dominated games. Legault stoned UMass on the road to sweep a series (Dec. 2-3) and Thibeault had a then- record 53 save performance in a upset of BU on Jan. 13.

Freshman Casey Kesselring has to be a frontrunner for Rookie of the Year, having been the only player named rookie of the week more than once. Kesselring (12-13-25) has teamed with Matt Adams (13-14-27) to lead the overachieving Warriors.

Lacking defense

Providence checks in with 27 points, having a loaded offense and an inconsistent defense. South Hadley native Chad Quenneville (12-18-30) teams with NHL draftees Brady Kramer (14-13-27) and Joe Hulbig (11-15-26) to provide endless offense. The goaltending has been a problem, with Dan Dennis (4.42, .861) the best of the bunch.

First-year Coach Paul Pooley must be scratching his head about his team which can defeat Brown (No. 10 in the nation) one day (Jan. 17) and then turn around and get hammered by UMass three days later at home.

Boston College is another team with a lot of offense and little defense, currently occupying the eighth spot. Goalie Greg Taylor has been left to fend for himself on most nights. The sophomore netminder has bad numbers for him (4.03, .877) but the porous defense gets the blame there.

Taylor owns that conference record for saves in a game with 60 in a 5-1 loss at BU. The Eagles face an uphill climb to avoid the 8-9 tournament play-in game, with the last four games of the season on the road.

As for the Minutemen, two conference victories add up to 10 points in the standings and confidence as the season continues.

Massachusetts ice hockey moving forward in '95

By Ted Kottler
and Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

Had the events of Dec. 31, 1994, not transpired as they did, it would have been pretty easy for University of Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen to find a New Year's resolution: Win a game.

But in their last opportunity of 1994, the Minutemen recorded their first victory of the season, outlasting Notre Dame 4-3 in overtime at the William D. Mullins Center.

Warren Norris potted the game-winning goal at 4:12 of the extra session, but it was leading scorer Rob Bonneau's nifty fake past an Irish defender that allowed Norris to beat goaltender Matt Eisler.

Freshman netminder Brian Regan earned the victory by making 29 saves. The win salvaged a split with Notre Dame as the Irish defeated the Minutemen 6-3 the night before.

"It feels good to be smiling in here," Mallen said during the post-game press conference. "It's been a long time coming."

Three more wins

UMass went on to win three more contests in January, including a 5-3 triumph atop Boston College on Jan. 7, its first ever defeat of a Hockey East foe. The result was especially satisfying since the Eagles trounced the Minutemen the previous evening at Kelley Rink, 8-4, in a game not nearly as close as the score indicated. Regan surrendered six goals on only 21 shots before giving way to Rich Moriarty.

Dave Kilduff (32 saves) was brilliant in the rematch, dazzling a crowd of 5,492 en route to his first win at the Division I level.

"We've basically done two great things in two weeks," Mallen said.

Bonneau scored three goals in the series to become the first UMass player named Hockey East Player of the Week. Manganaro scored twice in the second game against his former teammates.

"Rob Bonneau is a true success story, and I just hope he can continue to be," Mallen said.

On Jan. 15, New Hampshire came into Mullins and nailed the Minutemen 6-3. Kilduff was pulled early in the second period as UNH jumped out for five goals in the first period and a half. The game was the make-up for a contest originally scheduled for Dec. 10, 1994, which was cancelled due to unplayable ice.

A disappointing tie followed with Bowdoin Jan. 17, in which UMass made a big third period comeback only to see the Polar Bears tie it. Third period goals by Tiger Holland and Chris Fawcett gave UMass a lead, but Bowdoin's Joe Gaffney scored at 18:02 of the third to knot the score.

Surprising Stuart Logan stopped 53 UMass shots in his first full game this season.

Tough match-ups

Perhaps UMass' most convincing performance came on Jan. 20 in a rink that did not welcome them in their previous visit. When the Minutemen last skated at Providence's Schneider Arena, they could not protect a pair of leads nor could they prevent the Friars from completing their 5-4 comeback win on a two-man advantage late in regulation.

The second meeting was all UMass as it cruised to a 4-0 lead, embarrassing backup goaltender Bob Bell on several occasions. Bonneau and Manganaro each scored twice and Kilduff relieved Regan nicely once the freshman went to the bench after suffering a mild concussion midway through the first period.

Providence threatened to make it a game in the middle stanza, cutting the lead to 4-2, but the Minutemen finished strong with Bonneau's empty net goal at 19:47 the cap on a 7-3 blowout.

"Our guys are really starting to get a feel for the pace of a Hockey East game," Mallen said. "I give everyone credit. They moved the puck effectively and scored seven goals."

PAUL BEDDEAU / COLLEGIAN

After a tough start the Massachusetts hockey team has been successful lately.

PAUL BEDDEAU / COLLEGIAN

The offense and leadership that forward Sal Manganaro has provided has been a cause for celebration.

Returning home in search of its first back-to-back wins of 1994-95, Providence had other ideas as veteran goalie Dan Dennis compensated for his partner Bell's weak play two nights earlier. Dennis made 26 saves in the Friars' 5-2 win.

On Jan. 24, goalie Rich Moriarty made only his fifth appearance of the season, against a familiar foe. The Deerfield Academy graduate turned away 20 Army shots to preserve a 3-2 comeback win, his second over the Cadets in as many seasons.

After a scoreless opening period, the West Point team connected twice on the power play in the middle frame for a 2-0 advantage. Ian Winer and Joe Sharrock were the goalscorers, at 5:27 and 11:02 respectively.

Blair Wagar provided a preview of what was to come in the closing stanza when he deposited a tricky goal at 16:21 of the second. Mike Evans won a faceoff in the right circle directly to Wagar, whose shot deflected past goalie Brian Bolio (35 saves) off Tom Deveans' leg.

A pair of offensive smoking guns clinched win No. 4 for the Minutemen. At 7:34 Tom Perry stuffed in a rebound to tie it 2-2. Manganaro and Bonneau set up the man leading the team in assists with 12.

Holland had not scored a goal in 52 UMass appearances before shocking observers with his much-needed tally against Bowdoin. At 12:10, Holland again came through in the clutch as he slapped in an Evans feed that Bolio could not quite grab.

Sophomore forward Tom Sheehan, who was a regular contributor to UMass' offense in its first 14 games, played for the last time against Notre Dame on Dec. 30, 1995. He has since left school, citing personal problems for his departure.

UMass hosted the nation's No. 1 team, the Maine Black Bears, in a two-game Hockey East set at the Mullins Center last weekend.

Jerry Azzinaro joins Iowa State staff

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Jerry Azzinaro, defense coordinator for the University of Massachusetts football team this past season and linebackers coach since 1992, became the eighth assistant coach to join the Iowa State football staff.

Azzinaro was appointed as linebackers coach by Coach Dan McCarney Jan. 19.

"Jerry comes to Iowa State with the highest recommendations," McCarney said. "He has proven himself as a good field coach and as a recruiter."

Under Azzinaro last season, Massachusetts was tops in the Yankee Conference in total defense, with defensive end Brian Corcoran named the conference's Defensive Player of the Year. Breon Parker also garnered a spot on the Division I-AA All-America team.

The Azzinaro move has Massachusetts Coach Mike Hodges torn.

"From a coach's standpoint, it hurts us a whole lot," Hodges said. "Iowa State has found a talented coach and a great recruiter. From a personal standpoint, I'm happy as heck for him. It's a great opportunity and he's joining a real good staff."

McCarney has already hired former Louisville recruiting coordinator Bob Carskie, former Connecticut Assistant Coach Steve Loney, former Illinois State offensive coordinator Phil Meyer, former Utah Assistant Coach Sam Papalli, former Wyoming assistant Kirby Wilson, former West Des Moines Valley Coach Mike Woodley, and Wisconsin assistant Jay Norvell as assistant coach.

With the exit of Azzinaro, Massachusetts has a vacant position. The leading candidate for the defensive coordinator position is current Minutemen defensive line Coach Ted Roof, said Hodges.

Roof, who arguably coached the most talented part of the Minutemen's 1994 team in the defensive line, should make the move as head of defense, despite being coach at Massachusetts for only one season. If Roof is named defensive coordinator, he will also coach the linebackers, as Azzinaro did last season.

Men's and women's track start strong

- Minutemen set 13 season highs at Challenge Cup
- Liljeblad, women's track team roll during intersession

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team set 13-season highs and narrowly missed topping the field in the consolation round of the New England Challenge Cup Jan. 20 in Boston.

UMass scored 77.5 points, just a shade behind first place Rhode Island, which finished with 78 points.

Three veteran athletes paced the Minutemen's second place effort as Ethan Nadeau, John Johnson and Tom Galligani earned victories in their respective events.

Galligani, fourth on the team in points with 17, easily outclassed the competition in the triple jump with a season best 44_ performance. Coming in second was teammate Ron Tauro. UMass' top all-around competitor, Tauro, second in points with 23.5, jumped 42_. He also placed third in the high hurdles in 7.99 seconds.

Football tailback Johnson won the long jump with a season best effort of 21-11. Johnson is currently third in scoring with 23 points. Galligani placed third in the long jump at 20.

UMass distance expert Nadeau, edged Providence's Steve Myers by .11 in the 1,000 meters, 2:29.45 to 2:29.56. That time was a season best for Nadeau, as was his 1:53.41 run in the 800 meters at the NECC Trials the previous week at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H.

Freshman Scott Price has taken the program by storm, assuming the lead in points with 28. Price did not capture any events but he recorded his best time in the 200 meters, 22.48 seconds, which was good for second place behind Rhode Island's Dave Federico (21.88).

Federico won the 55 meters with a time of 6.51, while Price came in third in 6.69. However, Price had run the event in 6.4 in a tri-meet Dec. 3, 1994. Had he approached his best on this day, UMass would have won the meet. UMass' Lyonel Benjamin came in behind Price in 6.75.

Turn to MEN'S TRACK, page 11

Fifth-year senior Kelly Liljeblad set a school record and provisionally qualified for the NCAA Championships with her 4:50.22 time in the mile at the New England Challenge Cup Finals held Jan. 21.

Liljeblad, who took the fall semester off so she could return to finish her degree and also compete in indoor and outdoor track, has been outstanding. She has the best times for the team this season in the 1,000 meters, one mile and 3,000 meters and has qualified for ECACs in all three events. At the Challenge Cup Finals, she also finished first in the 1,000 meters with a time of 2:57.20.

The Minutewomen, who captured third out of six teams at the Finals, were also led by freshman Rosie Bryan, who placed first in the long jump with a leap of 18_ and finished third in both the 55-meter hurdles (8.34) and the triple jump (37-1). Bryan has already made a huge mark on UMass track by placing herself on the all-time performance list in three different events: the 55-meter hurdles, the long jump and the triple jump.

Senior Janey Meeks continues to dominate the triple jump, like she has for the past three years. She qualified for ECACs in the triple jump at the first meet of the season against Northeastern and New Hampshire with her jump of 38-9.

After an outstanding freshman outdoor track season last spring, sophomore Anya Forrest has also picked up where she left off. Forrest qualified for ECACs in the first meet of the season with her performance (8.1) in the 55-meter hurdles.

Rebecca Donaghue and Christie Martin have also performed well for the Minutewomen so far this season. Donaghue, who had an impressive cross country campaign, has had team bests in the 800-meter run (2:16.85) and 880 yard (2:22.32) while Martin has led UMass in the throwing events, the 20-pound weight (45-2_) and the Coaches guide women's gymnastics

By Mike Pinder
Collegian Staff

While their feet are often above their heads, this year's University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team has the coaching tandem of Dave Kuzara and Rene Lyst to thank for keeping their ambitions higher than their flips.

The combination has brought a wealth of knowledge and experience to the young Minutewomen squad.

Second-year coach Kuzara, a former high school All- American gymnast, served as assistant coach at the University of Michigan from 1990 to 1993. He helped mold Michigan into a national powerhouse in women's gymnastics in his short tenure.

Assistant Lyst also brings an abundance of experience to the UMass program. While Kuzara was leading the Wolverines into the national limelight, Lyst, in her senior year at Penn State University was captain of a Nittany Lion squad that placed 11th at the NCAA Championships in 1993.

Team-oriented philosophy

Excitement about the upcoming gymnastic season appears to be justified. The Minutewomen, 3-1 overall and 1-0 in the Atlantic 10 as of Jan. 27, have leapt out to an impressive start with intense enthusiasm.

The team is led by the quartet of junior transfer LI. Tolhurst from George Washington University, junior Shaheda Keels, and sophomorcs Lianne Laing and Tara Swartz.

Although Kuzara and Lyst promote a team-oriented philosophy, according to Kuzara, there have been tremendous individual performances from his four top all- arounders in the first four meets this year.

"There has been a lot of really outstanding performances," he said. "I think particularly J.J., Shaheda,

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Women's gymnastics is making a move toward national prominence.

Tara and Lianne Laing have done a great job. Those four people will anchor this team."

Even though the Minutewomen have the same record as they did last year at this time, there is one huge difference — the team's attitude.

This change in heart can be attributed to a new system brought to UMass by Kuzara and Lyst. The team has become accustomed and respond well to the coaches' styles.

Grueling practice schedule

"I think we are a little better team skill-wise this year," Kuzara said. "But we are a lot better team in terms of our attitudes and in the way we approach our gymnastics."

Part of this new system includes a preseason of three and a half to four-hour practices each day, five days a week. A regular season schedule runs practices on a three days on, one day off basis. Just like preseason, practices run from three and a half to four hours.

Due to their grueling practice schedule, the Minutewomen have become much more determined and mentally tough.

This new-found determination was evident in the meet against the University of New Hampshire. After a few untimely falls in the competition, UMass battled back with ferocious intensity to place second behind the Wildcats among the four-team field. Northeastern and Vermont finished third and fourth respectively.

"We have had some falls and some mistakes early," said Kuzara, "but you can visibly see our kids fight for every landing. When they do fall, they get right back up and finish strong and aggressively."

Finishing strong is exactly what the Minutewomen want to do this year, hoping that the determination they possess will lead them to the championships and point them in the direction of national prominence.

Men's gym heads westward

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team traveled four times over the break, competing in the West Point Open, the Rocky Mountain Open, the Air Force Academy and at Navy.

With a team score of 207.75, the Minutemen placed seventh in the West Point Open the weekend of Jan. 13. A highlight of the meet came with sophomore Ruslan Shupak's 9.40 performance on the vault.

At the Rocky Mountain Open Championships Jan. 20, the team took fifth place with a total of 214.40, ahead of both Arizona State and Air Force. The meet was won by the University of New Mexico with a score of 224.70.

In the individual event finals, freshman Kevin Schwartz earned the still ring title with a score of 9.70. Schwartz has taken first place in every still ring competition he has participated in so far this season. He has already broken the all-time UMass record of 9.70 for the event with his 9.80 at the UMass Open, the first meet of the season.

Sophomore Chris Funk also had nice performances in Colorado. He finished in the top five in two different individual event finals. Scoring a 9.40 on the floor exercise, Funk set a new career best, beating his 9.35 from last season's meet at M.I.T. He also scored a 9.50 to put him in fifth place on the still rings.

At the Rocky Mountain Open, the Minutemen improved their combined scores on all of their events, except for the high bar. UMass has far to go to reach its team event records, but the Minutemen are showing steady improvement.

The Minutemen continued their trip out West with a competition at the U.S. Air Force Academy Jan. 24. UMass beat Air Force by 2.50 at the Rocky Mountain Open. From there they headed to Annapolis, Md., to face Navy Jan. 28.

Statistics were compiled Jan. 26.

College basketball's mid-season report

ANTHONY GUIDO ON COLLEGE BASKETBALL

The college basketball season has reached its midpoint with the focus of the nation squarely on New England. Of course, UMass is 9-1 with UConn right behind at No. 2. Everything has gone perfectly for John Calipari and Jim Calhoun, but it's been a rough first half for others.

Now is as good a time as any to hand out some mid- season awards:

Most surprising teams

Arizona State Coach Bill Frieder has one star in power forward Mario Bennett and a team that has committed to his system. It seems like Frieder left Michigan such a long time ago only to resurface in the spotlight now with the Sun Devils.

Michigan State may be the class of the Big Ten. There may not be a better backcourt in the conference than Shawn Respert and Eric Snow. Respert has locked up an NBA lottery spot and propelled the Spartans into the Top 10. Many observers thought MSU was way too soft in the middle; they still might be, but right now the Spartans are surprising all.

Wake Forest has risen to the upper echelon of the ACC, that in itself a surprise. The inside-outside combination of Tim "Slam" Duncan and Randolph Childress has been good enough to handle most opponents, including an impressive road win at Virginia.

On a much smaller scale, how about St. Bonaventure? They take UMass to OT and already have two conference victories. The Bonnies have updated the hideous mustard-and-brown uniforms and will escape the Atlantic 10 cellar.

Most disappointing teams

This category has to begin with Duke. They now will be without Coach K for the season and have started 1-6 in ACC play. It has become apparent that Cherokee Parks isn't the star and leader out of the Ferry-Laettner-Hurley-Hill mode. The Blue Devils will struggle until someone can step into that role. Perhaps freshman Trajan Langdon can be that special player. Be wary: If Duke sneaks into the tournament with, say, a nine or 10 seed, they'd make for a very dangerous second round opponent.

Indiana, along with Duke, dominated the '80s. Once again, this is a team whose star needs to play better, as Alan Henderson has struggled. The backcourt is bare, the home winning streak is over (UMass now at 39 straight), and the NIT might be in the future.

Arizona started off on fire but has dramatically cooled off. Defensive whiz Reggie Geary hasn't adapted to the role left by shooting guard Khalid Reeves. Heralded transfer Ben Davis has become eligible and has only clogged the middle for center Joe Blair. This team has become unracked and fallen behind UCLA in that race for best in the West, meaning the Wildcats will likely have to travel come tournament time.

Where has Arkansas gone? The Razorbacks are out of the Top 10 — unbelievable. Scotty Thurman and Corliss Williamson need to stop mailing it in and Coach Nolan Richardson has to get the intensity up. The Hogs have found out the hard way just how difficult it is to repeat.

Nation's best players

Shawn Respert has become the most dynamic scorer and is now a team leader. The senior guard has turned from a gunner to a winner and exhibited skills that will make him a fine pro.

Tag team award here for UMass' Marcus Camby and Lou Roe, the most fearsome inside combination in the land. Together these power players have made the Minutemen the No. 1 team. Defense puts UMass where it is and Camby's shot-blocking is a big part of that.

North Carolina's dynamic duo of Rasheed Wallace and Jerry Stackhouse may be the best around. These two may be the best finishers in college basketball, always filling up the highlight films.

Maryland has one superman inside with Joe Smith. The sophomore possesses the offensive game to score all over the court. Smith has the talent to be named Player of the Year and could be the No. 1 pick in the NBA draft if he declares after this season.

Another super-soph is UConn's Ray Allen, who has blossomed into a supreme scorer. He can work the baseline or hit from three and tell you about it all the way back down the court.

Ed O'Bannon may be the most maligned superstar in the country. He too possess inside and outside skills and has shown tremendous heart throughout his career. He has battled back after a serious knee injury which kept him out of the game for a year. O'Bannon thrives in the pressure of playing at UCLA, a microscope few players have succeeded under.

Right now Gary Trent is a serious candidate for a first team All-American selection. The Ohio U. forward is built like no other, tremendous strength coupled with great athleticism. He has performed like many believed Williamson would; no other player possess the same power and intensity that Trent shows game in and game out.

Nation's best coaches

Time and time again Roy Williams proves he is a master planner and teacher. His Kansas team isn't as talented as the other Top 10 squads, but he gets them to play near perfectly. He rotates and maximizes his big men. Ask any coach to name the one team they don't want to face early in the season and they will name the Jayhawks. Williams traditionally has his team in top form before anyone else.

Calipari and company know about Williams and his early season wonders. Kansas has beaten UMass early in the season the last two years. Calipari has built an empire at UMass, a place which had about as little tradition (and success) as possible before Cal came. Calipari learned some of his magic as an assistant to Williams, and here they are — two of the top coaches in America.

Todd Bozeman at California is another young coach making waves. His recruiting skills are excellent and he has harnessed a world of talent into a good team in a tough league. Bozeman continues to improve Cal's program; expect the Golden Bears to explode in the next few years and be where UMass is now.

Best conferences

It has got to be the ACC. The conference has a few games on national TV every week and its always a great match-up. Top to bottom every team is quality. All have shots to make the big dance; nowhere else can that be said.

The Big Ten is in a bit of an upheaval but that has created excitement. Teams like Wisconsin, Penn State and Michigan State now are top-of-the-pack teams. The athletes in this conference are unrivaled. Now about creating a post-season tournament...!

Most inconsistent

Atlantic 10 member St. Joseph's gets the award. They possess quality wins over Villanova and Penn yet can lose to Monmouth College (ouch).

Worst uniforms

What is going on here? So many teams deserve mention for this award. Start with Kentucky. Those claw marks down the shorts are terrible.

Next a combined award for Penn and George Washington. Both teams have that same ugly pattern on their shorts only the colors are different.

St. John's shows some creativity for the "Manhattan Skyline" on the bottom on their shorts. The Red Storm (yuck) still makes the list for changing the nickname.

Villanova tops the cake with those indescribable uniforms. The traditional blue and white now has been swirled together with red.

Parting shots

All this debate over who (UMass or UConn) should be No. 1 is pointless. Settle this thing in the NCAA tournament on the court. Either an Eastern regional final or in the Final Four, this is the game everyone wants to see...The Atlantic 10 has gotten mixed reviews. Anybody can beat anybody (except UMass) as the conference is really beating up on itself. Problem is, will anyone else look good enough to get a bid come tournament time...

If you watch a few games with Dick Vitale doing the color, you may notice he has about 10 different teams that he "loves" for the final four. Heck, you gotta love Dickie V., he's part of what makes college hoop special...January is about over, conference races are heating up. Watch out for these teams to make some noise: Illinois in the Big Ten, Villanova in the Big East, Georgia Tech in the ACC, and George Washington in the A-10.

An open letter to the UMass Student Community from the Director of the UHS Eye Care Program, Spring 1995

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Program

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and the New England College of Optometry in 1975. I am very proud of the University Health Service Eye Care Program and the high quality of eye care delivered to more than 80,000 individuals over the last 20 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of the New England College of Optometry and recently co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. In addition, I am credentialed in diagnostic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry.

Eye care services include:

- Complete optometry examinations
- Reduced rates on spectacle frames and lenses from local participating opticians
- Emergency eye care
- Comprehensive contact lens service

Our staff takes great pride in being able to fit many people who have had difficulty in the past wearing contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Program over the years has been consistently excellent.

"I invite you to use the eye services at UHS."

UM starts A-10 conference schedule undefeated

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team extended its winning streak to 13 games, winning 10 straight games since first semester classes were completed

Massachusetts 91, Western Kentucky 72
Dec. 17, 1994

The Minutemen, who sport one of the strongest frontcourts in the nation, were out-rebounded 39–36 by Western Kentucky, but managed to control the game from start to finish.

The 50–39 halftime score represented the highest lead in the first half, as Carmelo Travieso hit a three–pointer with 16 seconds left in the half.

Massachusetts turned it up in the second half, increasing the lead to as much as 25 when Mike Williams buried a trey with 5:08 left in the game.

Williams led all scorers with 21 points, including 4–9 from three–point land. Dana Dingle and Donta Bright each scored 14 points and Marcus Camby, who did not play the second half due to sickness, scored 12 points in 15 minutes.

The Hilltoppers had four players scoring in double figures, with Chris Robinson leading the team with 20.

Buckler Christmas Challenge
Dec. 27–29, 1994

STRASBOURG, France — The world–traveling Massachusetts Minutemen finished 0–3 against European professional teams at the Buckler Christmas Challenge.

The first day consisted of two 20–minute mini–games. In the opener, UMass fell to the tournament's home team, then Strasbourg, edged the Minutemen 57–52 in overtime to the delight of the crowd.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari started his bench against Pau Orthez and they responded playing well, but fell 44–43 in the second game. Pau Orthez went on to win the tournament.

In its final game of the tournament, led by Komazec's (no first name listed) 43 points, Italy's Caviga Varese defeated UMass 102–95. Lou Roe led UMass, scoring 27 points. Marcus Camby also scored 22 and Edgar Padilla chipped in 13 in the losing battle.

Massachusetts 95, West Virginia 65
Jan. 3

SPRINGFIELD — The No. 4 Minutemen blocked an Atlantic 10 record 20 shots en route to trouncing West Virginia 95–65 at the annual Abdow's Classic at the Springfield Civic Center.

The major criticism of the Minutemen entering the 1994–1995 season was their lack of outside shooting. Against the Mountaineers, the Minutemen silenced the critics for at least a night.

Carmelo Travieso was on fire in the first half. The sophomore guard scored a career–high 15 points, nailing five three–pointers before halftime.

Fellow sophomore guard Edgar Padilla turned in his top performance as a Minuteman as well. The Springfield native equaled his career high with 17 points, highlighted by a buzzer–beating trey at the end of the first half.

The game served as a coming out party for sophomore Tyrone Weeks. The big forward collected a double–double, scoring 10 points while grabbing 10 rebounds.

On the negative side, Andre Burks suffered a season–ending knee injury. The freshman guard underwent surgery to repair damaged ligaments in the joint.

Massachusetts 80, Saint Louis 74
Jan. 5

ST. LOUIS — In front of the largest crowd ever to see a basketball game in the state of Missouri (21,879), the Minutemen held off a late surge by the previously unbeaten Billikens to beat Saint Louis 80–74 in the Kiel Center.

The game was the second in the Great Midwest Atlantic 10 Challenge. Temple won the first game over Marquette, so the Minutemen's victory completed a sweep for the conference.

The Minutemen were without sophomore center Marcus Camby, who left the team to attend his grandmother's funeral. UMass missed his presence against the undersized Billikens.

Seniors Lou Roe and Mike Williams were impressive for the Minutemen. Roe, who had ESPN announcer Dick Vitale singing his praises throughout the contest, scored 29 points and eight rebounds. Williams had 18 points, including two treys.

The Minutemen defense also played a key role as the high–scoring trio of Erwin Claggett, Il Waldman and Scott Highmark were held below their normal scoring capacities.

Massachusetts 87, LaSalle 64
See story, page 8.

Massachusetts 81, St. Bonaventure 76 (OT)
Jan. 10

OLEAN, N.Y. — In its first game since returning to the No. 1 ranking, Massachusetts got a scare from an unlikely source. The usually lowly St. Bonaventure Bonnies kept the Minutemen on their heels throughout the game.

After Mike Williams nailed a trey to give UMass a late three point lead, David Vanterpool hit a three–pointer with time running out to tie the game at 69 and send it into overtime.

The Bonnies jumped ahead in OT leading 75–71 before the Minutemen responded. Led by five overtime points from Marcus Camby (28 points, 10 rebounds), the Minutemen went on a 10–1 run to squeak out the victory.

"I wanted to come in here, win by 30, and get the hell out," Calipari said. "We weren't ready for St. Bonaventure and we struggled."

Massachusetts 85, Rutgers 68
Jan. 12

Playing down to the level of the Atlantic 10 is something the Minutemen have to be concerned with. On one Thursday night, Massachusetts did just that for the first 20 minutes.

The visiting Scarlet Knights played Massachusetts tough in the first half, as they were down just three at the half, 36– 33, after a Rich Ashmeade three–pointer with less than :01 in the half.

An Andrew Kolbasovsky jumper to start the second half cut the Minutemen lead to one — and ended up being the last basket of the Rutgers rally.

An 11–0 run by Massachusetts, which included two three– pointers by Derek Kellogg and four missed free throws by the Scarlet Knights, made it 47–35 at 16:37.

Shortly after, Marcus Camby was called for a personal foul and a technical foul. The tech, his second of the game, forced an ejection from the game. Albert Karner made four straight free throws to cut it to eight, 47–39.

Without the services of the star center, the Minutemen went on a 13–1 run capped off by a Lou Roe dunk that made it 60–40.

Rutgers got as close as 14 on two free throws by Charles Jones (game–high 19 points) with 5:36 left, but could not conjure up a late–game rally.

Massachusetts 93, Pennsylvania 60
Jan. 14
See story, page 8.

Massachusetts 91, Rhode Island 75
Jan. 19

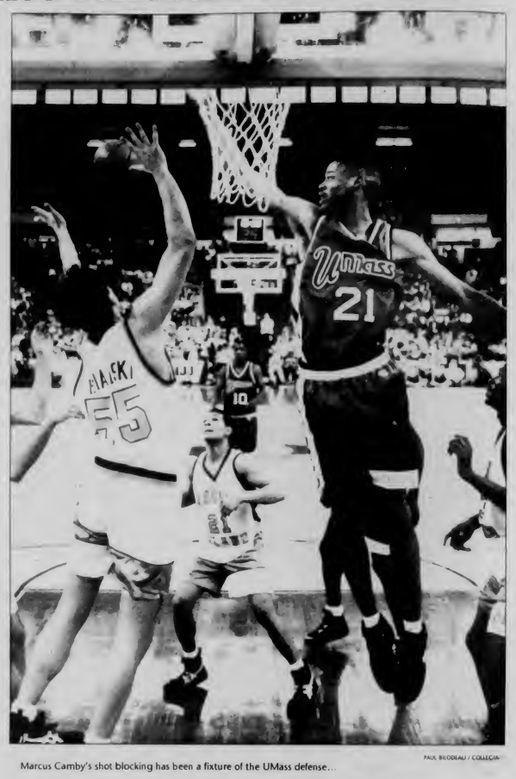
PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The University of Rhode Island had no answer for Marcus Camby as Massachusetts cruised past the Rams 91–75 in front of a sold–out but considerably quiet Providence Civic Center.

The sophomore center dominated in his 26 minutes of play. He led all scorers with 27 points and grabbed seven rebounds to go along with four blocked shots and three steals. He scored 11 straight second half points to help extend the UMass lead to 21 points.

UMass used strong defense to compensate for a sloppy offensive performance. The Minutemen used a full–court press to force the Rams out of sync and into several first–half turnovers.

Neither team shot well early but UMass outrebounded URI en route to a 41–28 halftime lead.

In his career, Derek Kellogg has a history of playing well against Al Skinners' squad and this time was no different. The senior co–captain had 14 points, including three treys.



Marcus Camby's shot blocking has been a fixture of the UMass defense..

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Cordell Llewellyn had 21 points for Rhode Island, but much of it came with Massachusetts comfortably ahead with the Minutemen starters playing cheerleader roles as the subs took the floor.

Massachusetts 59, Temple 58

See stories page 7.

Massachusetts 103, Duquesne 53
Jan. 24

PITTSBURGH — Who needs Derek Kellogg anyway?

Massachusetts definitely will, come tournament time, but in this game against Duquesne the Minutemen proved they had plenty of offensive puneh without their starting point guard.

With Kellogg on the bench suffering from a pulled groirr and Tyrone Weeks not even traveling with the squad due to illness, Calipari used Dana Dingle and Mike Williams in the starting backcourt.

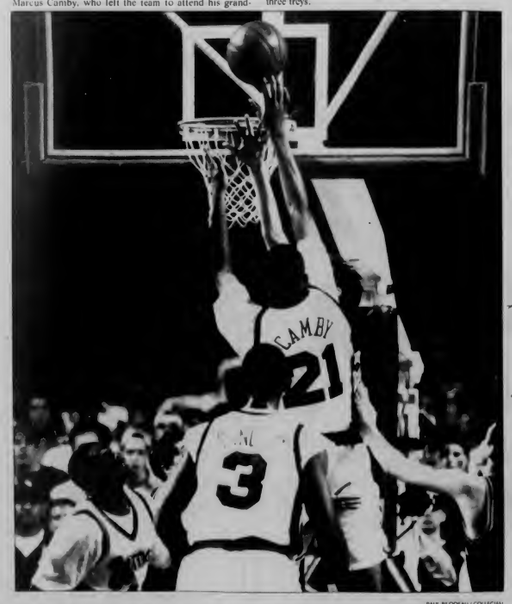
After the Dukes jumped out to a 9–2 lead, the Minutemen woke up and blitzed Duquesne.

Marcus Camby dominated the paint again for Massachusetts, hitting on 10 of his 16 shots from the floor en route to a 23–point evening.

Sophomore Carmelo Travieso was the first guard off the pine for Massachusetts and played extremely well, scoring 11 points, grabbing nine rebounds and dishing out six assists while turning the ball over only once in 28 minutes of action.

Jason Germain's three–pointer in the waning moments pushed the Minutemen over the century mark for the second time this season; the next time down the court, Travieso banked in a buzzer–beating trey to give Massachusetts its largest margin of victory this season.

Editor's note: The Minutemen competed at West Virginia last Friday and at St. Bonaventure last night, but both games were played after press time. Summaries of the two games will appear in tomorrow's paper.



...while his improving offense has been a key to its success.

Home streak nation's longest

Compiled by Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

• Indiana's loss to Michigan gives University of Massachusetts longest home win streak in the nation

With a 65–52 loss to Michigan at Assembly Hall, Indiana's 50–game home winning streak, the nation's longest, ended. Now assuming the top spot, with a 39–game win streak, is the University of Massachusetts Minutemen. The streak includes 25 wins at the William D. Mullins Center where UMass has never lost, and 14 at Curry Hicks Cage.

The Minutemen have not lost on–campus since Jan. 8, 1992, when they fell to West Virginia 94–75.

The Minutemen could extend that streak to 45 before the season is over, with games against St. Bonaventure, St. Joseph's, George Washington, Duquesne, Rhode Island and potentially the Atlantic 10 championship game.

• All Minutemen eligible for semester

Despite the much publicized academic problems last spring, the entire squad will be eligible to play this semester.

• Williams scores 1000

With 2:23 seconds to go in UMass' 85–68 victory, senior guard Mike Williams hit a free throw that put him over the 1,000 point milestone for his career. Williams is only the 26th Massachusetts player ever to accomplish the feat.

Senior forward Lue Roe leads all current Minutemen with over 1500 career points.

• Burks to miss season

After what appeared to be a minor injury, doctors determined that freshman guard Andre Burks tore his anterior cruciate ligament in Massachusetts' 95–65 win over West Virginia. He underwent surgery and has begun rehab. Burks will receive a medical redshirt to retain all four years of eligibility.

• UMass plays in front of largest basketball crowd ever in Missouri

The 21,789 fans who witnessed UMass beat St. Louis 80– 74, was the largest crowd ever to see a basketball game in the state's history. Tickets to UMass games have been hard to come by, both at home and on the road, as the Minutemen have played to a sellout crowd every game so far this season.

UMass Minuteman Notes

• UMass–UConn first ever New England 1–2 basketball

When the Associated Press basketball announced its weekly college basketball poll Jan. 9, for the first time ever two New England schools sat atop the poll. The then 8–1 Minutemen received 44 first place votes while the 10–0 Huskies had 17.

• Julius Erving on hand for LaSalle game

Former UMass alumni, New Jersey Nets (ABA) and Philadelphia 76ers great Julius Erving was on hand to watch his alma mater defeat LaSalle in Atlantic City.

• Camby misses St. Louis game due to death in family

The Minutemen were without sophomore center Marcus Camby against St. Louis, who was attending the funeral of his grandmother.

• Penn victory largest ever in Mullins

Coming into the game, the Quakers were the highest ranked non–conference opponent (No. 21) ever to play in the William D. Mullins Center, but a more dubious distinction awaited the Ivy Leaguers upon their exit.

Their 93–60 loss to UMass set records. The 33–point blowout was the largest margin of victory ever in the Mullins Center. Larger than St. Bonaventure, Buffalo, Central Connecticut...ever.

• Duquesne blowout largest since 1938

The Minutemen's 103–53 pounding of the Dukes was the worst loss that the Pittsburgh institution has endured since Jan. 1, 1938.

• Seven different starting lineups contribute to success

Whether it be due to illness, injury, suspension or the coach's decision, Massachusetts has started seven different combinations of players en route to its 14 victories. Seven different players have factored into the equation, as Roe, Camby, Williams, Derek Kellogg, Edgar Padilla, Dana Dingle and Donta Bright have all been on the floor at tipoff. No player has started every game.

The Minutemen will likely have at least one more starting five, with seniors Jeff Meyer and Jason Germain potential starters on the Feb. 28 Senior Day game against U.R.I.

• Minutemen struggle in France

The Minutemen finished 0–3 in the Buckler Christmas Challenge, falling to Strasbourg, Pau Orthez and Caviga Varese in Strasbourg, France.

"You cannot beat the Buckler Christmas Challenge in terms of a cultural experience for these kids," Calipari said. "They are playing a game that they would not experience on the college circuit. They will come back stronger and wiser."

Massachusetts barely squeaks by Temple

■ Minutemen survive mistakes and a second half offensive surge by Owls

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Fact: The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is the No. 1 team in the country.

Fact: The Temple Owls, who lost current NBAers Eddie Jones and Aaron McKie to graduation last season, are a young team banking on the future rather than this season.

Fact: This is all irrelevant once the Minutemen and the Owls take the court against each other.

On Jan. 21, the rivalry was renewed yet another time at the William D. Mullins Center. And for the third time in the last four contests between the two teams, it came down to the wire.

The nail–biting ending mainly encompassed the last 1:51 of the contest, and it took a late Lou Roe jumper, a later Marcus Camby block, an even later Mike Williams deflection off an inbounds play, and ultimately, a Temple missed opportunity with less than a second left. But the Minutemen managed to squeak by the Owls, 59–58, before a raucous sellout crowd.

After Roe's jumper made it 59–57, Derek Kellogg fouled out with :56 left, and Williams hacked Temple's Johnny Miller at :51. The Owl guard hit one of two free throws before a timeout was called by each team.

Temple had :15 seconds to take the advantage. A put–back off a miss by Levan Alston was swatted out–of–bounds by Camby at 5.8.

Each team then took timeouts, only to have the next Temple chance deflected out–of–bounds with 1.5 left. A final Owl shot was taken with less than a second to play, but the shot did not fall.

Shooting off for Temple

"No. No, we can't shoot," Temple Coach John Chaney said when asked if he saw anything develop in the final minutes of the game. "We cannot shoot. We play good defense, but we cannot shoot."

The Owls had a difficult first half that saw leading scorer and point guard Rick Brunson pick up two quick fouls in the first four minutes of the game. Brunson sat the bench and watched his team head into the intermission down 11, 38–27.

"You get your ass out in front of your head, it's no good," Chaney said. "I think sitting there makes him realize a lot of things. He doesn't have to carry this team, the only thing he has to do is set the table."

Brunson did pick up his third foul with 16:34 left in the game, and he did miss two free throws on a technical foul handed to the Massachusetts bench early in the second half. Yet, the senior from Salem, Mass., did finish strong.

Kellogg buried a three–pointer at 11:25, and Brunson did the same to get Temple within six, 47–41. After a dunk and a free throw by Camby on two separate plays, Brunson was fouled attempting a trey. Three made free throws by Brunson, and the Minutemen lead was back at six, 50–44, with 9:44 left to play.

Massachusetts then kicked the lead out to 10 once again on a Mike Williams layup, 55–45, before a 9–0 run (seven points by Brunson) cut the lead to one, 55–54, with 4:52 remaining.

Intensifying the rivalry

The Temple defense did rattle the Minutemen throughout the second half, holding them to 21 points in the final 20 minutes. Does this take anything away from the No. 1 team in the country? Chaney does not think so.

"We always play close games, and given the fact that they're the top team in the country, I think when the score got a little closer, they begin to negotiate the floor," Chaney said. "I think that's about all it is.

"It doesn't send any message that they're any less at all. They're a great ballclub, perhaps the most balanced ballclub there is in the country. They do what they have to do to win, and I think they did that today, both defensively and offensively."

Massachusetts did what they had to do to win against Temple, but the storied rivalry added yet another chapter.

"I said before the game, I told everybody that if you think this is going to be an 18 to 20–point blowout, you're crazy," said Massachusetts Coach John Calipari. "I mean, we're playing a team that understands the importance of this game. This rivalry is right there with any in the country, and you could see it today."

Calipari's counterpart on the Temple bench agreed.

"The rivalry takes it up a little notch, and the fact of the matter is . . they know going in they're going to have a tough game with us," Chaney said. "I don't care whether it's in the tournament or whenever it is. They're going to have a tough game because of that unwritten element that's there.

"But when it comes down to win, they win."

Four teams in dogfight for second; the Bonnies primed for late season

Compiled by Andrew Bryce and Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

With the exception of No. 1 Massachusetts and cellar– dwelling Rhode Island, the Atlantic 10 is a dogfight as no team seems prepared to take control of second place.

Temple, on the strength of tradition and experience, would seem a likely candidate, but losses to George Washington at McGonigle Hall and lowly Duquesne have left the Owls in a congested four–way tie for second place.

• Another team expected to compete for the second spot is St. Joseph's. The Hawks, who put a scare into everybody during preseason in the Atlantic 10, have not been feared much this season. St. Joe's, who beat Villanova Dec. 18, 1994 (60–57) to go 3–0, lost to Monmouth (71–62) 10 days later. Since a 67–62 victory over Duquesne Jan. 7, the Hawks have swapped every other win with a loss as of Jan. 23, after defeating the LaSalle Explorers.

Consistency is not the Hawks' forte. They should attempt to be as consistent as their mascot who waves his arms all game, every game.

• Even George Washington, who surprised the nation by dropping the vaunted Syracuse Orangemen (despite the loss of Yinka Dare), has been flimsy as of late. Unless one team either makes a serious run or upsets the Minutemen in the A–10 title game, Massachusetts will be the only team from the conference headed to the tournament.

Mike Jarvis is quietly rumored to be on the hot list of coaches that could be headed to more attractive jobs in the future. The former Boston University Coach has done great things with the D.C. based program, and with the Atlantic 10 on a potential slide, Jarvis may explore opportunities.

• Also rumored to be headed for exit door is Rutgers Coach Bob Wenzel. Unlike Jarvis however, a boot may follow Wenzel through it. With next year's jump to the Big East, Rutgers becomes an attractive job. Wenzel has had minimal success in the A–10, so not much more will be expected in the Big East.

• Rick Brunson is used to giving up the ball in crunch time, not being relied on when the game is on the line. Yet with the young Temple team, Brunson is expected to shoulder much of the load as the names of Eddie and McKie have moved on to $greener$ pastures.

Brunson did stand out in the William D. Mullins Center in the Owls' 59–58 loss at Massachusetts after sitting out the last 16 minutes of the first half due to foul trouble (two fouls).

Brunson led the Owls back into the game against the Minutemen after they were down 38–27 at the half. He scored 15 points (including 5–7 three–pointers) and garnered three steals.

On the season, Brunson is averaging 15.8 ppg (sixth in the A–10), 4.45 apg (also sixth in the A–10), and is second in the conference in steals (3.18 per game).

•Despite being highly touted, Huey Futch has been invisible so far at Temple.

• Marcus Camby could grab the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. The Massachusetts sophomore center has won the A– 10 Player of the Week three times, the most thus far this season.

Camby is averaging 15.8 ppg and 7.1 rpg, and has blocked a league–leading 46 shots. He is also second in the A–10 in field–goal percentage (.593).

• Don't look now but the men of the mustard and brown are on the move. St. Bonaventure, after starting a typical 0– 3, has sprung to life. Their only conference losses have come at GW and Temple, and an overtime heartbreaker to Massachusetts.

The Bonnies' schedule has them primed to make a late– season run up the standings as well. They take on hapless Rhode Island and a not–much–better Rutgers squad twice, and could definitely beat the Mountaineers and Dukes, whom they play once. An upset over anyone like Temple, GW or Massachusetts could give the former conference doormat their highest seed in recent memory.

Rivalry still strong despite losses of Jones and McKie

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Nobody believed him.

"It's going to be a war," Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said before the Jan. 21 Massachusetts–Temple showdown. "It always is. Whoever has the ball last is going to win."

Fans and reporters passed his comments off as "coachspeak." Make your opponent look good so the win looks better.

How could Temple make this game a war? Stars Eddie Jones and Aaron McKie were playing their basketball on the opposite ocean.

"This rivalry is right there with any in the country," Calipari said. "This kind of game brings out the best in people."

The Minutemen beat Temple with Jones and McKie in the Atlantic 10 Championship by 11 points. Without them? UMass would certainly win by 30. Even the oddsmakers didn't give the Owls any chance. They favored the Minutemen by a whopping 18 points.

So when the unranked Owls came into the William D. Mullins Center and came within a Marcus Camby blocked shot of upsetting the No. 1 Minutemen, the true scope of what a rivalry can do to a game was exposed.

"This rivalry is right there with any in the country," Calipari said. "This kind of game brings out the best in people."

Temple Coach John Chaney agreed.

"The rivalry takes it up a notch," Chaney said.

Early on, it did not bring out the best in Massachusetts native Rick Brunson. The only remaining member of Temple's star trio of a year ago got two early charging fouls. By Temple team rules, a player who gets two first half fouls rides the pine for the rest of the half. So Brunson watched as the Owls fell behind 38–27 at halftime.

At the start of the second half, it wasn't only Brunson re– entering the game. With him, pride entered in the rivalry.

Brunson, who has never won a collegiate game in Amherst, led the charge for the Owls by scoring 15 points in the second half as Temple continued to chip away at the lead.

With UMass ahead 59–58, 14.6 seconds left, Temple had a chance to win the game in the closing seconds. But on three tries the Owls had a shot blocked, a pass deflected out of bounds and with .6 remaining, Levan Alston missed from the corner and UMass held on.

Temple has become almost accustomed to horror in the closing seconds.

Two seasons ago in the Curry Hicks Cage, Tony Barbee put in his own rebound in the closing seconds to give UMass only its second ever victory over the Owls.

Last season, Mike Williams drove past Rick Brunson to give UMass a 56–55 victory.

Eleven days later Williams enhanced his legend in the rivalry draining a banked three–pointer to give UMass its first ever victory in McGonigle Hall. Williams has led UMass in scoring in the last four games against Temple.

John Calipari was half wrong The team with the ball last missed, but it was a war.

Round two is scheduled for Feb. 23 at McGonigle Hall.

Lou Roe struggles in Atlantic City

■ Senior forward held to two points in homecoming

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Call it punishment for breaking an unwritten rule. They say you can never go home again, yet Lou Roe did and he paid for it.

When Roe returned to his hometown of Atlantic City on Jan. 7, LaSalle University welcomed him and then made him wish he had never come back, despite falling to the University of Massachusetts 87–64 at the Atlantic City Convention Center.

Roe, the leading scorer for the Minutemen at 16.4 points per game, was held to two points on only four shots from the field, that coming on an alley-oop pass from Derek Kellogg with 1:11 left in the blowout.

Massachusetts	87
La Salle	64

"Lou fits into the mold of taking kids home. The pressure's on, he wants to prove what he can do," Calipari said. "He says I jinxed him because I told him he was going to play bad. Everybody plays bad when they go home.

"He said, 'You jinxed me.'"

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Senior Lou Roe, shown here against URI, had a monster performance against Penn.

Roe did collect seven rebounds in the contest, and despite turning the ball over four times, he was upbeat after his subpar performance.

"I was trying to play within myself. I got in early foul trouble, and I tried to come out in the second half and just do what I do best," Roe said. "It just didn't happen for me tonight. I'm not going to let this game get me discouraged. I'm just going to play the next game and go at it again."

Without Roe on the floor for much of the game, the Minuteman frontline was the story. Sophomore Marcus Camby scored 15 points and grabbed 11 rebounds while forward Tyrone Weeks set a career high with 12 points.

"We were saying in the locker room before the game that we were going to win this for Lou, no matter what," said Weeks, who also had five rebounds on the night.

A possible storyline which never materialized was the head-to-head match-up of Roe and his former teammate at Atlantic City High School, LaSalle's junior forward Romaine Haywood.

Haywood had as much success as his former teammate did from the floor, yet his field goal was from behind the three– point arc. His point total equaled the number of fouls he commited — five. Roe had four personal fouls in 18 minutes of action, while Haywood fouled out in 30 minutes.

Roe joked after the game by saying that he didn't know how he felt about playing against his old teammate because they didn't get a chance to.

"We both hollered at each other after the game, saying we didn't do anything. We both stunk up the place," Roe said. "But it was good for him and good for me to come home and show our families and friends our respect."

With one co–captain held 14 points below his season average, Massachusetts found offense from an unlikely source — the other co–captain, Kellogg, who scored a season–high 18 points, including four of seven from three– point range. His only assist, however, was the lob pass to Roe with 1:11 left.

The victory over LaSalle alowed Massachusetts to regain the No. 1 ranking in both the Associated Press and USA Today/ CNN Coaches' polls.

Minutemen dismantle Quakers at home

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Around the nation, Division I basketball coaches sat in front of their TVs and shuddered.

After appearing vulnerable in subpar tired performances against Rutgers, St. Bonaventure and LaSalle, the University of Massachusetts unleashed all of its weapons as it dismantled then No. 21 Pennsylvania 93–60.

Pennsylvania	60
Massachusetts	93

The Quakers came in as the highest rated non–conference opponent ever to visit the William D. Mullins Center. They also carried a reputation of giant killers, and with UMass expected to be tired after playing five games in the previous nine days, Penn was in position to knock off the biggest giant of them all.

It didn't happen.

"People didn't think we could win this game," Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said. "People thought Penn was going to come in here and beat us. Our kids knew that and they played big. I'm proud of them."

In fact, the beating the Quakers took was the largest margin of victory ever in the Mullins Center.

From the tipoff, it was clear that UMass was not going to lose. The Minutemen were nearly flawless as every player seemed to be having a great night. They opened up a 24–9 lead and cruised to a 46–28 halftime lead.

During the Minutemen's rough stretch, Lou Roe was noticeably absent. The senior forward came to life against the Quakers scoring 25 points and grabbing 10 boards. Penn Coach Fran Dunphy praised the Atlantic City native.

"I think he's a first round [NBA] draft choice," Dunphy said.

Roe pointed to his concentration as a key to his resurgence.

"I stayed focused," he said. "I felt comfortable out there. I did what I needed to do."

"Lou Roe sprinted the floor. He exploded around the basket," Calipari said. "He exploded after rebounds. He was always a step ahead."

Marcus Camby teased Roe that the performance was directly related to the presence of ESPN.

"We knew Lou waq coming with ESPN," Camby said. "He always steps it up for those kind of games. He's TV Lou."

Three other Minutemen also scored in double figures. Mike Williams (17 points), Camby (15) and Donta Bright (16) all had impressive performances.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Dana Dingle has been one of seven players to start for UMass this season.

Calipari pointed to the easily overlooked play of Dana Dingle as well.

"I thought Dana Dingle played great defense and rebounded the ball," Calipari said. "He did good things out there."

Following the game, Calipari believed his team performed to the top of its skills.

"That's as well as we can play," Calipari said. "Penn hit a buzzsaw today. They hit a buzzsaw that didn't turn the ball over, that looked for each other, that attacked the basket with reckless abandon. We shot the ball well and played relentless defense.

"It wouldn't have mattered who we played, the score would have been very similar. It's nice to be able to sit back and enjoy a game like this," he said.

Williams disagreed.

"I think we can be better," he said. "You can always get better."

When asked if the team felt tired after six games in 11 days, Roe said it was quite the contrary.

"After going 6–0, we feel stronger," he said. "We knew they beat Michigan and a good St. John's team. We weren't going to have that, especially here in the Mullins Center. We wanted to make a statement with this game."

They did.

The win improved the Minutemen to 10–1.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

UMass Coach John Calipari said the team needs Lou Roe to rebound consistently for the Minutemen to be successful.

Minutemen on top once again

For the first time two New England schools are No. 1 and 2

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

When the fog cleared after a week of upsets, the Minutemen sat atop the college basketball polls for the second time in the 1994–95 season.

It started at Chapel Hill, N.C. No. 1 North Carolina fell to instate rival North Carolina State by 10.

It wasn't any easier in Fayetteville, Ark., as the third– ranked Razorbacks could do no better against Ole Miss.

While the No. 4 Massachusetts Minutemen were putting the finishing touches on a victory over Saint Louis, the Oregon Ducks were finishing clearing UMass' path to the top, as they upset the No. 3 UCLA Bruins.

When the poll was announced on the following Monday, the Minutemen had received 44 first place votes to easily vault them back to the No. 1 rank.

Upsets, tough schedule

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari attributed the rank to the team's difficult non–conference schedule as well as the flurry of upsets.

"We're No. 1 because a lot of teams lost, and we play a tough schedule," Calipari said.

UMass, the only team to hold the top spot more than once this season, also held the top spot in the second week of the year.

After a shocking 104–80 upset of the pre–season No. 1 Arkansas Razorbacks in the first game of the season, the then No. 3 Minutemen vaulted over second–ranked North Carolina to the top of the hill.

The rank set off all kinds of excitement and distraction throughout the Bay State. Even though Calipari and his players tried to downplay it, with a week between the Arkansas and their next game, there was nothing to alleviate the Minutemen from the pressure surrounding No. 1 status.

"We acted like it didn't matter," Calipari said. "Let's not kid ourselves. It did matter. It was special."

It all disappeared when the Minutemen fell to Kansas the following weekend, dipping to No. 5 in the polls.

Not satisfied with rank

Their second stint at the top almost ended more abruptly than the first when UMass nearly lost to St. Bonaventure. UMass has since settled down, winning their next six games.

Now that they are more comfortable in the spotlight, the players are looking toward an even loftier No. 1.

"I know I'm not satisfied with being No. 1," said senior guard Michael Williams. "I think the No. 1 ranking at the end of the season is the most important. We'd rather be No. 1 at the end of the season than right now.

"I think we got a little carried away last time after beating Arkansas and we embraced the stuff at the time. This time we're focused playing."

With a seemingly soft schedule remaining, there has been talk of UMass not losing the rest of the way, but Calipari quickly dismissed the notion.

"We're not going to win every game," Calipari said. "We're going to play every game to win, but I don't think we're going to win out."

New England rivalry

In its second stint at the top, a neighbor came with them. For the first time ever, there were two New England schools ranked No. 1 and 2 in the poll as Connecticut also made a big jump. The proximity in the polls has created a rivalry between the two schools.

There is more than bragging rights at stake between them as the No. 1 seed in the East Region of the NCAAs looms as a potential prize for the victor.

Since the poll, there has been enormous pressure to schedule a game between the two schools down the road.

Editor's note: If Connecticut defeats Kansas this weekend, or if Massachusetts falls to West Virginia, there is speculation that the Huskies will leapfrog the Minutemen in the polls, but both games will be played after press time.

Women's hoop finding success

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

After starting out the season at a disappointing 0–5, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has turned its season around by winning nine of its last 10 games, including a six-game winning streak, to improve its record to 9–6, 4–1 in the Atlantic 10 conference.

Massachusetts 65, Vermont 46
Jan. 3

This game was the Minutewomen's first in 20 days but the long lay-off apparently did not affect UMass' two junior leaders, Octavia Thomas (21 points, seven rebounds) and Melissa Gurile (14 points, eight rebounds). Sophomore Beth Kuzmeski chipped in 10 points, including two three-pointers, and grabbed seven rebounds. UMass dominated the boards, particularly on the defensive end where they grabbed 33 rebounds compared to the Catamounts 18. The Minutewomen shot 54 percent from the field.

Jan. 5

The Minutewomen's domination in the paint was the key against the Lady Owls. UMass scored 38 points from inside the paint while Temple could only muster 10 points inside. The Minutewomen also had 49 rebounds compared to the Lady Owls' 32. Temple could only round up eight offensive rebounds. Gurile scored a team-high 15 points and grabbed nine rebounds while sophomore Crystal Carroll had 14 points and was a perfect 4–4 from the line. Kraft chipped in with nine points, including a three-pointer, and grabbed five rebounds.

Massachusetts 75, St. Bonaventure 58
Jan. 7

This was a bit of a homecoming for the Minutewomen, who had been away from home for almost a month. After a close first half which saw the Minutewomen up by only a point, 37–36, they pulled away in the second. The Minutewomen used an 18–0 run to turn a six-point game into a 24-point cushion.

UMass had balanced scoring as four Minutewomen, Gurile (18), Thomas (12), Carroll (10) and freshman Kara Tudman (10) finished in double figures, while Kuzmeski and freshman Tez Kraft finished with eight points a piece. Tudman shot 6–6 from the line and also snagged 10 boards to record the first double-double of her career.

Massachusetts 78, Rutgers 67
Jan. 12

The Minutewomen had never beaten the Lady Knights in 23 previous tries. After a first half which saw them down 36–22, it looked like the streak might reach 24. But UMass outscored Rutgers 21–9 in the first eight minutes of the half to pull within two, 45–43. The Minutewomen then took its first lead of the game with 5:50 left on a Sabriya Mitchell three-pointer.

Kuzmeski hit two three-pointers in the final four minutes to extend a five-point edge to 10, 70–60, with 2:05 left. The Minutewomen increased their lead to as many as 13 (77–64) with 23.1 seconds left. UMass shot a blistering 64.3 percent from the field in the second half as four Minutewomen once again finished in double figures.

Thomas led the balanced attack with 19 points, while Gurile and Mitchell had 11 and 10 points respectively. Kuzmeski finished with a season-high 18 points and was 4–7 from three-point land and 4–4 from the line. The victory extended the Minutewomen's winning streak to six games.

George Washington 69, Massachusetts 60
Jan. 15

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Beth Kuzmeski set a new UMass record with seven three-pointers against Dartmouth.

The Minutewomen gave the 16th-ranked Colonial Women a tough game, but could not pull off the upset. With the score 37–31 at the intermission, GW went on a 9–2 run to open up the second half and increase its lead to 46–33. But UMass then went on an 11–0 run, nine of those points coming from Kraft, to pull within two.

The Minutewomen eventually tied it at 53 with just under nine minutes left but a Darlene Saar three-pointer made it 58–53 and from then on the Minutewomen never cut the lead to less than four. The loss was UMass' first of the season in the A-10 and it stopped its six-game winning streak.

Massachusetts 70, Brown 48
Jan. 17

The Minutewomen rebounded from their loss to GW by demolishing the Bears. UMass shot an amazing 76 percent from the field in the first half to lead 37–15 at the break. The Minutewomen quickly cooled off in the second shooting only 33 percent but still was able to get the win. In the victory, Thomas became only the seventh Minutewomen in history to reach 1,000 points in a career. She finished with 17 while Gurile had 14 and Carroll (nine rebounds) had 13.

Jan. 21

UMass was once again outstanding from the field in the first half, shooting at a 55.2 percent clip. But unlike the previous game against Brown where UMass went cold after a hot first half, the Minutewomen shot even better in the second (63 percent). For the third time in its last five games, UMass had four players in double figures in points. Thomas led the way with 27 (11–14 from the field) and also pulled down 12 rebounds to record her third double-double of the season. Gurile (21), Kuzmeski (16, 7–10 from field) and Kraft (10) were the other Minutewomen who finished in double figures.

Kuzmeski set a new school record for three-pointers made in a game with seven (the previous record was five which she had tied twice last season) and scored a game-high 23 points. She led the Minutewomen over the Big Green in a sloppy game which saw the two teams turn the ball over a combined 24 times in the first half, a whopping 45 times in the entire game. UMass turned the ball over a 24 times, 14 of them came in the first half. Kuzmeski set the record with 4:05 left in the game and got her seventh with 1:55 remaining.

With the score 33–28 at the half, the Minutewomen went on a 19–8 run to put the game out of reach. In that stretch Dartmouth created numerous turnovers, but was unable to convert points off them, enabling UMass to pull away.

Carroll had her best game of the season scoring 21 points on 10–14 shooting from the field while Thomas and Gurile chipped in with 10 points apiece. Point guards Mitchell and Tricia Hopson each had outstanding games. Mitchell dished out a career-high nine assists while Hopson had seven. Both turned the ball over only twice.

Minutewomen notes: Thomas nets 1000th

Compiled by Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Thomas leading the way

Octavia Thomas' play has been one of the major reasons why the Minutewomen have won nine of their last 10 games. Not only is the junior forward leading the team in scoring (15.4 ppg), rebounding (8.3 rpg), field goal percentage (.576) and steals (25), but in UMass' 70–48 win over Brown University (Jan. 17), she scored her 1,000th career point to become only the seventh player in Minutewomen history to accomplish that feat.

Her 1,049 points puts her in the sixth spot on the UMass all-time scoring list and she needs 57 points to move into fifth place. Thomas is sixth among the all-time leaders in rebounding with 594 and needs 11 to move into fifth.

Gurile closing in on 1,000

Junior Melissa Gurile needs just 17 points to reach 1,000 for her career. She is currently in eighth place on the all– time list with 983. Gurile is also on her way to becoming the all–time blocked shots leader. She currently has 113 career blocks, trailing only Helen Freeman (1987–90) who had 143. Gurile is only the second player in Minutewomen history to record 100 blocks in a career.

Carroll picking up her play

Sophomore Crystal Carroll, after a slow start, has averaged 11.2 points and 4.9 rebounds in the last 10 games. Against then No. 16 nationally ranked George Washington (Jan. 15), Carroll was a force on the offensive end. She had a team–high 14 points on 6–13 shooting from the field and 2–2 from the line. Carroll's best game of the season came last week against Dartmouth when she scored a season–high 21 points on 10–14 shooting from the field. UMass has a 5–1 record this year when Carroll hits double figures.

In the zone

Sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski set a new school record last week against Dartmouth when she sank her sixth three– pointer of the night with 4:05 remaining, then hit a seventh with 1:55 to go. The previous record was five, which she hit twice last year. She finished the game with 21 points, 7–9 from the three point line. Against GW on Jan. 15, Kuzmeski showed she is more than just a three–point threat. She pulled down a team–high nine rebounds, the third time in her career she has led the Minutewomen in rebounding.

Changing of the guard

Since the start of the new year junior Tricia Hopson has taken over the starting position at point guard and in her eight starts she has led the team to seven victories. Against Dartmouth last week she had a season–high seven assists and committed only two turnovers. As a freshman, Hopson started the final 16 games and led the team in assists (101).

Sophomore Sabriya Mitchell, who started the first seven games, dished out a career–high nine assists last week against Dartmouth. She leads the team with 74 assists.

Tudman out

Freshman Kara Tudman, who had started 12 of the first 14 games, injured her neck in practice last week and had to miss the Dartmouth game. The injury is not thought to be serious but she probably will be out for another week. Tudman was leading the team in free throw percentage (12– 14, .857) and was second on the team in blocks with seven before the injury.

Sparkplug off the bench

Freshman Tez Kraft has been a spark off the bench. In UMass' loss at GW she led a UMass 11–0 run by scoring all nine of her points on 3 of 3 field goal shooting and 3 of 4 from the line to help make a 13–point deficit into a two point game.

Around the rim

The 4–1 start in the Atlantic 10 is the best ever by UMass. The previous best start after five games was 3–2. With their 82–69 victory over URI on Jan. 21 and George Washington's loss to Rutgers on Jan. 22, the Minutewomen are now tied for first in the A–10.

UMass has had four or more players score in double figures four times, against St. Bonaventure, Rutgers, Rhode Island and Dartmouth: all victories. Last year, UMass was 7– 1 in games in which four or more Minutewomen scored in double figures.

UMass has been hitting its free throws of late. In its last 12 games, the Minutewomen have shot for a percentage of 78.1 (157 of 201). Overall, they are hitting 74.8 percent (185 of 247). Last year, UMass led the A–10 and finished in the top 10 in the nation in free throw shooting, coming in at No. 9 with a 73.8 percentage from the line. They also set a school record, breaking the previous record of 71 percent set by the 1979–80. UMass is 4–0 at home.

All stats were compiled by Jan. 27.

Freshmen making an impact

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's swimming team struggled in dual meets against Connecticut and Dartmouth but captured the four–team Rhode Island Invitational meet to give them a 3–2 record for the break.

Despite an excellent performance from Karen Sonnwald, the Minutewomen fell to Dartmouth 141–102. The freshman continued her impressive rookie campaign setting new pool records in the 500–yard (5:04.04) and 1,000–yard (10:23.99) freestyles. Her time in the 1,000 is also a new UMass varsity record.

Sarah Baker was also a double winner in the sprints against the Green Wave, capturing the 50–yard and 100–yard freestyle races.

Massachusetts captured first place in the annual Rhode Island Invitational, beating host Rhode Island, Providence and Maine in the two–day competition. The Minutewomen finished with 448 points for the meet, 94 points ahead of the Providence Lady Friars who finished second.

The meet was extra satisfying because UMass had not beat Providence in four years.

Massachusetts Coach Bob Newcomb said that the format of the meet was perfect for his squad.

"Providence has strong frontliners, a couple of very good swimmers," Newcomb said, "but we have the most depth. That was a huge advantage for us."

The 200–meter freestyle relay team of Baker, Jessica Griffith, Toni Youngdahl and Jodi Walters captured first place in the event with a time of 1:40.58, while Griffith was also a winner on her own placing first in the 200–yard breaststroke (1:09.84).

Freshman walk–on Angelique Rodriguez continues to be a pleasant surprise for Newcomb, as the native of Puerto Rico captured the one and three–meter diving competitions.

Sonnwald was strong again for UMass capturing the 500 and 1,000–yard freestyle races, as the times of 5:07.81 and 10:28.05 were good enough for first place.

The success of Sonnwald, Rodriguez and the rest of his freshman class has Newcomb excited about what the future could bring.

"They are a very solid class. We're doing well now," Newcomb said. "I look at the future and I expect our team to be that much better."

Despite losing handily at the hands of Connecticut, Newcomb was not upset.

"That is the best team we've ever swam against," he said. "I'm not upset about losing to them."

The 3–2 intersession improves the Minutewomen's record, at press time, is 5–3 for the season.

Swimming successful over the break

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Sometimes clouds are truly silver–lined.

Men's swimming and diving Coach Russ Yarworth expected another exceptional season for his squad but unexpectedly found himself faced with adversity. Six team members either quit or were booted due to disciplinary problems.

And yet, despite these potentially crippling losses, Yarworth remains unwaveringly upbeat about his team.

"I couldn't be happier," Yarworth said. "This is the hardest working group of kids I've ever had."

Over winter break, the team has practiced up to six hours each day. Its record during intersession (4–1) indicates that the resolve of the swimmers has paid off. Capable leadership from senior tri–captains Tim Milbert, Jeff Shearstone and Jeff Wicklund, the continued commitment of juniors Dave Laporte, Jeff Little and John Luviano, and the rapid progress made by first–year swimmers Scott Herbert and Dan Peck, have also been invaluable factors.

UMass enjoyed home–pool advantage in their first intersession meet against a Dartmouth team quite similar to the Minutemen in ability.

The day began on a sour note for Yarworth and crew as the opponents' divers built a quick 32–6 lead in the opening events. From that point on however, the meet evened out. Going into the final event, UMass needed only to post a second–place finish in the 800 freestyle relay to win. Proving that their grueling training was effective, the UMass team achieved their goal, pulling off a 154–146 victory.

Next on the schedule was the Rhode Island Invitational at U.R.I., a quadrangle meet at which the Minutemen would face, in addition to the host, Maine and Providence.

"We went there to show those teams that UMass was not a weak team," Yarworth said.

A crushing 541–point performance over their three adversaries (Providence was closest with 313 points) was the result of the Minutemen's urgent mission.

Although the first two meets were overwhelmingly positive for UMass, perennial rival and meet host University of Connecticut would prove too strong in the team's latest matchup. A valiant effort by junior transfer Keith McLarty in both the 200–yard individual medley and 200–yard backstroke could not ward off the UConn assault, which led to a 156–81 Huskie win, their first in nine years against the Minutemen.

"They rubbed it in pretty good," Yarworth said of the loss. "So guess who's going to remember next time around."

Despite the blow suffered from UConn, Yarworth remains optimistic about upcoming meets with New Hampshire, Brown and St. John's.

"My guys know what it takes to win as Division One athletes," Yarworth said.

Shot putter Mark Lefebvre could not top one of the most dominating stars on the regional track circuit, Central Connecticut State's Chris Dukes. Dukes eclipsed all competitors in the shot put by more than a foot with a throw of 49–4 _. Lefebvre finished third at 46–9 _, though he set his season–high at the NFCC Trials with a 47–8 effort.

Other season bests were set by David Cahill in the 400 meters (52.29, fourth), Corey Cameron in the 500 (1:07.84, fourth), Mike Maceiko in the mile (4:22.37), Matt Behl in the 3,000 (8:38.58, fourth), Rob Dalton in the 35 pound weight throw (45–10) and Jim Leary in the pole vault (13 feet).

UMass' 4x400, 4x800 and distance medley relay teams also set season highs.

Nicole Roberts, forward for the women's soccer team, has brought her outstanding quickness to the track team and has the season best in the 200–meter dash (25.95), which she set at the Cup Finals.

The Minutewomen were 3–1 as of press time and were at Dartmouth with New Hampshire and Vermont on Jan. 28.

New networks for a new year

Tube Notes By Tracy Gaud

For those of you out there who aren't already aware of the abrupt network "switch" that went into effect on Jan. 2, the situation is like this: because of some big business deal (the details of which are still unknown to me) Boston's Channel 4 ended its 40-year affiliation with NBC and Boston's Channel 7 took over.

Local newscasts and syndicated shows stayed put, but all national programs switched stations. I know that somebody's got to be making money off all of this rigmarole, but unfortunately, I have yet to discover exactly who that is (certainly not the viewer, that's for sure).

I predict that Channel 4 will turn out to be the big loser in the end. Sure they inherit David Letterman and "Murder, She Wrote," but they also lose "Seinfeld," "Dateline," "Frasier" and "ER." Ouch, that's gotta hurt.

And something tells me that Dr. Quinn won't be enough to make it all better.

Another major change in television involves the creation of two new networks, Warner Brothers (locally Channel 56) and United Paramount (locally Channel 38).

I got a chance to sample a few of their programs, which ran the predictable gamut from promising to excruciatingly awful.

My personal favorite was the premiere of the UPN drama "Marker" about a handsome (aren't they always) loner who learns important stuff about his dead father while helping troubled fools at the same time.

Richard Grieco seems to enjoy reprising his tough, yet tender "21 Jump Street" role, and it was quite entertaining

Julie Delpy and Ethan Hawke share an intimate moment in 'Before Sunrise'

Sleepless in Vienna

Director Richard Linklater and co-stars Ethan Hawke and Julie Delpy on Romance, taking chances, and the making of "Before Sunrise"

BY TARA MK CONNELLY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NEW YORK — Richard Linklater, director of the films Slacker and Dazed and Confused, knows what it's like to be labeled. In fact, it's the word "slacker" that most out-of- touch people use to define an indefinable generation. However, Linklater feels that his newest film, Before Sunrise, starring Ethan Hawke (Reality Bites) and Julie Delpy (White), should dispel any notion of him becoming the next director/spokesperson for a seemingly defunct generation.

The plot of the film is simple: Jesse and Celine are two people who meet on the Eurail. They have chemistry and find some common ground. Unfortunately Jesse has to get off the train, but is reluctant to leave Celine behind. So, he invites her to get off and walk around a foreign city with him for a few hours of laughs, love and whatever comes next.

"The film had to ring true— no false sentiments. We didn't want a lot of false cinema," Linklater said, relaxing in a t-shirt, jeans and a scruffy goatee at a recent press conference with his two co-stars.

"We [Hawke and Delpy] threw a lot of ideas around," said Linklater. "I think it's a hybrid of American and European [culture]."

"I did this film because I saw Richard's work and read the script and I loved it," said Delpy in a soft accented voice sitting to the right of Linklater.

Ethan Hawke joked that it was Linklater's "boyish good looks" that attracted him to the script.

"No, I was a big fan of Dazed and Confused and then Slacker and when I saw his movies, I had to work with him," he amended, looking much younger in person, minus greased-up hair and sparse goatee.

Linklater worked with two different casting directors to find the main characters for the script which he co-wrote with Kim Kritzan, whom he met when she auditioned for a part in Slacker. (Later she landed a role in Dazed as English teacher Mrs. Shroud.)

Linklater knew that the film itself would be hard to pull off because it was a lot of dialogue centered around two people. He chose Hawke to play Jesse because he didn't have a "macho" attitude. Delpy was chosen because he wanted Celine to be "intense, deep and mysterious."

"Casting is a lot like love at first sight," Linklater said. "When it happens you know it. Most of the cast for Dazed and Confused my casting director would call them in and they'd walk in the door and I was like 'He's Mike.' Eighty percent was like that."

"I spent a lot of time casting for this movie even before I finished Dazed, like if I was in town or even in Europe I'd spend a few days meeting people," said Linklater. "This took longer and was a little more difficult in a different way. And I think it was that I was really picky. I wouldn't have made the movie. It was a great feeling when I finally got Ethan and Julie in the same room together and we kind of did a scene and talked about it, but as soon as I saw the words come out of their mouths I was just like, that's it. There never was another thought."

It was important for Delpy to create a character that was natural, much like the script itself.

"There was a bit of me in it [Celine], but not totally me. When I read the script it couldn't stay like this, it would evolve into something else," said Delpy.

For Delpy, Before Sunrise was a chance to become exposed to a wider American audience. A prominent star in her native country France, the 23-year-old is also directing her own 10-minute film Blah, Blah, Blah.

"It took a lot of work," said Delpy, "but I loved it. I loved directing and I love acting."

The actress' first role was at age 14 in the movie Detective, directed by Jean Luc Godard. Since then she has been able to work with other European film greats like Carlos Saura (The Dark Night) and Agnieska Holland (Europa Europa).

"I must admit I'd never worked so hard in my life than during this time. I am lazy by nature and English is not my first language. We worked out every single detail so we'd know instantly what to do on location," Delpy said.

Her American film credits include The Three Musketeers and Killing Zoe. As far as future roles go, Delpy is "waiting to be inspired" and is looking for the script that will take her "one step further."

> "This film is about individuals," explains Linklater. "I never saw this film in terms of 'generation' at all. We really cut away a lot of that. This film could have been made 50 years ago."

Hawke is also trying to reach a broader audience by choosing roles that present him with a greater challenge in terms of character development.

"I always felt that what we were trying to do was really, really different. You don't have a real plot line to fall back on or a story line to carry the tension of the movie. Your tension really lies in the very simple idea of him meeting someone," explained Hawke, "and I just knew that it would be extremely hard to pull off."

"[Hawke] said to me, 'I'm afraid of this,' and I said 'Oh yeah? Me too,'" Linklater said.

But despite both their concerns they decided it was a worthwhile attempt and the rest as they say, is history.

In the meantime Hawke's career isn't going to suffer from a lack of challenge. Like Delpy, Hawke was 14 when he landed his first big role, in Paramount's Explorers. Later he got the part in Dead Poet's Society that launched him into prominence. Other film credits include White Fang, Dad, Alive and his most recent, Reality Bites.

Hawke spent exactly six months in college, but didn't let it slow him down. In addition to acting, Hawke is also an artistic director of the theater group Malaparte and a musician. Although some would label him, and especially his character in Reality, as the prototype for twentysomethings, Hawke is not disillusioned by the references or the status such a label can bring.

"Back then I was scared out of my mind, but now I think I'm just healthy scared," Hawke comment about his early beginning in comparison to where he is now. "I can tell you better in five years how I'm doing now."

In addition to the careful attention to casting, another important element to Before Sunrise is the setting. The entire film was shot in chronological order in Vienna, Austria.

"I picked Vienna because it was one city that actually spoke English," said Linklater. "I actually went to a film festival there for Dazed and Confused. Germany had no humor. I didn't want Paris, Venice or even Prague. I didn't want any of those 'hip' places."

Both Hawke and Linklater agreed that it was the classical aspect of the city that mixed Old and New World Europe together in a unique and beautiful way that added to the script.

Delpy, Hawke and Linklater went through a three-week reading of the script before shooting. Together they improvised, rewrote and fine tuned the writing.

"There were some parts that were improvisation," said Linklater. "It was like: funny scene with two Viennese people T.B.A."

Several of the extras in the film were actual Austrian actors and actresses and were picked by Linklater for various reasons.

"I had an immediate attraction to one of the extras because his name was Tex. I mean you come all this way from Texas to meet someone named Tex," said Linklater, laughing.

Linklater was born in Houston, Texas. Before his career as a director took off, his early days were spent working on an oil rig after dropping out of college.

"I never wanted to finish college," admitted Linklater. "I saved my money and kind of bought my way out of society."

He worked because he saw it as a necessary step to achieving his ultimate goal— filmmaking. In 1984 he moved to Austin and four years later shot his first film entitled It's Impossible To Learn To Plow By Reading Books. It was a 89-minute feature shot on Super 8, but it was a beginning, and a year later Slacker was born, a narrative spanning 24 hours in the life of 100 characters.

It was not until 1993 and Dazed and Confused that Linklater became a star. The film provoked thousands to contemplate the seemingly cool era of the '70s, edging the nation further into the grasp of retro-ism.

Linklater is gathering the fruits of his labor now and seems very much the self-assured director minus any flashy Hollywood entrapings.

Hawke sheds slacker image for classic romance

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

It seems like a match made in cinematic heaven. Richard Linklater: The critically acclaimed director whose name has virtually become synonymous with the dreaded "Generation X" since his debut film Slacker managed to coin legions of apathetic twentysomethings everywhere. Ethan Hawke: The greasy-haired, malcontent whose roles in such films as Reality Bites and Dead Poets Society has made him the pin- up boy for a disgruntled youth culture that likes it's angst served with a pretty face.

BEFORE SUNRISE
Directed by Richard Linklater with Ethan Hawke, Julie Delpy

The result, Before Sunrise, Linklater's third film, can at times seem is pretty predictable. At face value what you get is another random sequence of events thinly disguised as a plot which in turn are held together by streams of conversations that deal with such standard "X'er" fare as "accepting death as a child" and "becoming messed up by your parents."

But don't dismiss Linklater as down for the count yet. Beneath all the intellectual brewha that Before Sunrise dishes out by the plateful, there is a amorous and complex love story brewing just beneath the surface. Ditching the ensemble cast and rock n' roll bombast of his last effort Dazed And Confused, Linklater has decidedly headed in a more intimate, low-key direction.

The (ahem) plot is based around a single reoccurring question that lingers throughout the film: is it possible to have the greatest romance of your life last only one night? Jesse (Hawke) is an American, who after being jilted by his girlfriend whom he was visiting in Spain, decides to tour Europe. On a train ride to Vienna (which is where his flight is leaving from in the morning) he meets french student Celine (played by actress Julie Delpy) and voilà - love at first sight.

In a slightly unconvincing turn of events, Jesse eventually convinces Celine to postpone her travel plans and go off with him on a one-night jaunt through the streets of Vienna. From there on the film concentrates on the conversations that the couple have, the development of their relationship and the overhanging question of will they ever see each other again.

Sound boring? Remarkably enough it is not. A bit pretentious at times, yes, but hardly ever dull thanks to Linklater's sharp eye for character detail and stellar performances from both Hawke and Delpy. Before Sunrise is almost entirely dialogue driven and lacks any real "edge of your seat moments" but it is in these elements that the actual charm of the film lies. By doing away with any excesses and just concentrating on two characters, Linklater has created a small, intimate picture that at times almost has a classical feel about it.

Hawke has thankfully dumped the smart-ass chip on his shoulder that made him so darn irritating in Reality Bites, and instead brings to his character a subtle wit and nervous charm that adds to the film's almost "magical" feel. Though he does lapse into his "super-hip Gen X" persona a bit too often (his speech about how he wants to start a 24-hour cable channel that just follows people around while they do boring day to day things sounds like a leftover excerpt from Slacker), Hawke manages to

ELECTRIC ROCK MUSIC
Ass Ponys
A&M Records

COURTESY THOMAS CONDON

The Ass Ponys come up a winner with their major label debut Electric Rock Music.

If the music biz never panned out for Cincinnati's Ass Ponys singer/guitarist/lyricist Chuck Cleaver, a career as a writer may not have been such a bad option.

He is a natural storyteller, and not entirely unlike the short stories penned by Raymond Carver, Cleaver has a knack for chronicling the unsung tales of everyday losers, lovers and loners.

But unlike Carver, who put his stories down on paper, Cleaver manages to weave his tales into rustic, often dark, melodic pop tunes.

Electric Rock Music, the Ponys' third release and first for A&M Records, manages to take Cleaver's wildly eccentric ruminations and mesh them with a no frills, southern-style backdrop complete with healthy doses of pedal steel and slide guitars. The contrast can at times be downright startling.

While the music on the album leans towards traditional, it does provide Cleaver with an effective platform to play ringleader. Spouting his bizarre narratives which range from the time a friend tried to strangle him with an article of clothing ("Banlon Shirt") to a guy drinking his troubles away while sitting lakeside ("Lake Brenda"), Cleaver eagerly grabs the spotlight and takes the listener on a fascinating journey through a "Twin Peaks"-like world of small town characters and paralyzing loneliness.

"There's a place out there/Where the grass won't grow/There's a place out there/ Where the bugs won't go," he warns ominously on the track "Place Out There," easing into the role of the backwoods sage with an obvious delight. It is just that ability to easily and convincingly adopt his characters' personalities so well that makes Cleaver such a master storyteller.

When he sings "Comfort me you wall eyed girl/Hold me like a doll," in his slightly off-key, high-pitched yodel, the effect is so sincere it brings an almost unnerving sense of honesty to the Ponys' already beautifully raw and unflashy approach.

Still, despite the conventionalism of the band's actual music, Cleaver's unorthodox subject matter and delivery make Electric Rock Music no easy listen. But it is just that open armed acceptance of the oddball fringes of society that makes the album such a small but ultimately endearing piece of work. A- (Matt Audette)

JUMP SALTY
Pinhead Gunpowder
Lookout Records

The idea of the "supergroup" has been all too recurrent in just about every genre of music. Unfortunately most of these all-star projects, from Bad English to Temple Of The Dog, have left a lot to be desired.

Thus it comes as quite a surprise that, unlike other such projects, punk rock's representative "supergroup" Pinhead Gunpowder actually manage to be significantly better than any of the bands represented in their line-up.

Comprised of members from Bay Area acts Crimpshrine, Fuel, Monsula and yes, Green Day, Pinhead Gunpowder is exactly what collaborative efforts should be. The best qualities of each bands' sound are brought together to create an end result which is greater than the sum of its parts.

The fact that each member brings with him his own distinct style and agenda is what elevates Pinhead Gunpowder above that "all the songs sound the same" phenomenon which plagues countless other punk acts. Musically, the band is so cohesive that it's easy to forget that this is only a side project. The four co-leadsingers exchange the vocal spotlight so fluidly that you would think they've been playing together for years.

The voice of Green Day's Billie Joe and the lyrics of Aaron from Crimpshrine seem to have been made for each other. Green Day's frontman never sounded as impassioned as he does singing "Sometimes it's what you love most that suffocates you" on the beautifully melancholy "MPLS Song."

Tracks like "Keeping Warm In The Nighttime" and "Heastly Bit" are so earnest that you won't mind it when they're stuck in your head for days on end.

Distinctly refuting the slacker stigma attributed to the genre, "I Wanna" is an example of all out caffeine-charged punk like they just don't make anymore.

Pinhead Gunpowder also delivers one of the best cover songs in recent memory. Their rendition of "Big Yellow Taxi" revitalizes the Joni Mitchell classic for a new generation, invigorating it with a hard-hitting energy worthy of her lyrics.

Originally recorded almost three years ago and released as two 7"s and a handful of compilation tracks, the 12 songs collected on the Jump Salty CD successfully embody the true spirit of the Berkeley punk scene in the days before its recent commercialization. A- (Matthew Justin Faerber)

UNIVERSITY
Throwing Muses
Sire/Reprise

A few years ago, it would not have been hard to imagine never seeing another release from Kristen Hersh with the Throwing Muses.

Step-sister and bandmate Tanya Donelly's departure, a not-all-too-well received release (Red Heaven), a baby, and an accoustic solo album would have led many to believe that the Muses were done.

University, the seventh full-length release from Throwing Muses, starts off with a bang and nearly trips over its own feet in the first mile, only to pull itself up for the second half.

"Bright Yellow Gun" is one of the few upbeat cuts on the album and could lead those not already familiar with the Muses' work to be surprised at the subdued nature of the album as a whole.

But University's energy lies not in its music (a couple of three minute tracks actually drag) but in the voice of Hersh. After "Bright Yellow Gun," the emotion doesn't pick up again until "Shimmer," "Calm Down, Come Down," and "Crabtown," a dreamy yet deliciously somber track complete with ocean swells throughout.

Hersh's voice reaches all the boundaries, from haunting and childlike on "Snaketown" to dejected and tortured on "Teller." And while half of tracks would be lost without her emotional augmentation, the other half are still strong enough to stand on their own. The haunting instrumental "University," while only a minute and a half long, is charged with enough backwards and reverbed voices to conjure up some wonderfully nightmarish results.

It's the dark and anguished tracks that make University shine despite a few lulls, and in the end, if you let it, will have you curled up in the corner at 2 a.m. staring at the shadows on your walls. B (Mike Maclean)

CRAZYSEXYCOOL
TLC
LaFace Records

TLC's sophomore effort is a melange of melodies laced with funk, groove and seductive crooning. Much like Salt 'N' Pepa, the trio has shed their baggy clothes and gang bang persona for a softer side of soul.

CrazySexyCool is a fitting title to a bunch of songs that celebrate their coming into maturity. Even the album cover shows that they're ready for a change but haven't lost their edge.

Several of the tracks were produced and mixed with the help of Kenneth "Babyface" Edmunds, a name that has helped launch the likes of Boys II Men and Janet Jackson into Top 40 stardom.

A lot of the elements that first drew audiences attention to TLC are still here. The first single, "Creep" has everyone moving to the mellow confession of an unhappy relationship.

Another track that cleverly combines funkiness with awareness is "Waterfall," a retro-sounding song that contemplates dreams and realities with the message laden chorus, "Don't go chasing waterfalls/Please stick to the rivers and lakes that/You're used to/I know that your gonna have it your way/Or nothing at all/But I think your moving too fast."

"Switch" and "Let's Do It Again" are tracks that carry the same presence as their earlier hit singles, "Baby, Baby, Baby" and "Ain't To Proud To Beg" off their first album with assertive lyrics and cool beats that let no one on any uncertain terms take them for granted. "Sumthin' Wicked This Way Comes" is a preachy tune that holds a message, but with neat hip hop persona that keeps the song from becoming pretentious.

However, TLC still has to work on their ego. A lesson in humility might be needed. Their faces are plastered on the front and back of the album, inside the liner notes, and (just in case you forgot their stunning continence) on the CD itself. Hey, they picked themselves as the tenth best album of the year in Rolling Stone.

The same problem goes for the album's title. The words "Crazy, Sexy, Cool" are branded into you like a meditation mantra. Plus one of the interludes plays a healthy tribute to the fallacy of phone sex, prank calls and men in a crude joke.

However, this attitude launched TLC to stardom, and their talent, backed with that "cute girls of the hood" look, will keep them around for a while. After all, Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes may have burned down her boyfriend's mansion, but he is still marrying her and hip hop fans will still buy their album. B+ (Tara MK Connelly)

Art and monks highlight back to school events

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has a variable plethora of events on campus that help make the transition from home to school a little bit easier. And it is a bonus to know that Saturday night options aren't diminished to Scrabble with soda pop or watching the shadows flicker on your bedroom wall.

Visual art exhibitions are a constructive way to stare at something and just let your mind wander. The Augusta Savage Gallery will open up the semester with "Power of the Spirit," a collection of multicultural ideas and thoughts transposed onto canvas and other medias for your viewing pleasure.

In addition to the gallery's art work, a film series will begin in February for Black History Month on Feb. 7, at 7 p.m., with a film and video by Julie Dash. Two other films, Illusions and Praise House will also be featured. Call 545-5177 for more information.

The Wheeler Gallery will enable the campus to view the works of Westfield artist John Kuniezr, an interior decorator who earned his bachelor degree in interior design at UMass. His paintings exemplify his consciousness of time and space. Gallery hours are Monday-Thursday 4 p.m.-8 p.m. and Sunday 2 p.m.-5 p.m.

For those of you struck by the beauty of light and color, the Hampden Gallery is featuring "My Life in Neon" a retrospective of neon art by Pacifico Paiumbo and Michael Collins. Gallery hours are Monday-Friday 3 p.m.-7 p.m. and Sunday 2 p.m.-5 p.m.

If your appreciate the more vocal side to entertainment, the GLBC will be presenting Bill Garber, one of the country's most amusing and talented gay comedians at the Hampden Theater Feb. 4 at 8 p.m. Tickets $5; Five College students/seniors $5.

Bowker Auditorium will house the play Monkhood In Three Easy Lessons, Feb. 11 at 8 p.m. with performance artist Dan Kwong. The play will include monologues and movement illustrating the role and misconceptions of Asian men in today's society. Tickets $3.50/students and $6 general public.

Mount Holyoke College will sate your musical appetite by hosting the Five College New Music Festival with works from Bester, Bonde, Edwards, Tarlow and Tillis. The musical menagerie will be held in Pratt Auditorium Feb. 2 at 8 p.m. Call 545-2227 for more information.

The Raw Carrot Vegetarian Cafe & Juice Bar located on East Pleasant Street in Amherst will be displaying local artist Trace Meek's work. Beginning Feb. 1 "Brand Spankin' New Work (Painting, Drawing, Photos," a series that captures the dream-like musings of an artist's consciousness will grace the bar's walls. Works include large paintings that emphasize color, form and location with the image of the human form. And if you enjoy the work at the juice bar, "Recent Paintings" another exhibit at Rao's Coffee Roasting Company on Kellogg Avenue will also be on show. These painting are a collection from Meek's B.F.A. Thesis project.

Finally, for those who would prefer the more hands on element of art and entertainment, free introductory music, theater and dance classes will be sponsored by the UMass Arts Council in order to celebrate the debut of their Performing Arts Division.

It is a perfect chance for students and Valley residents to indulge in something they always wanted to do but never had the chance. And having it available to them free of charge is excellent incentive.

Would-be artists and performers can choose from a wide variety of activities, from Afro-American dance to jazz, tap, modern and ballet. For those with a more musical inclination, private instructions for the piano, harp, organ and voice are also available for your learning pleasure. Spring 1995 walk-in registration at PAD begins Jan. 30; classes begin the week of Feb. 13.

Locals 'Dance the Night Away' with melancholy debut

By Matt Audette

DANCE THE NIGHT AWAY
The Scud Mountain Boys
Chunk Records

Sure, everyone hurts but very few can find the right way to translate those feelings into something that others can easily understand. Thankfully this isn't a problem for Northampton's Scud Mountain Boys, whose debut album Dance The Night Away is a heart-wrenching exercise in missed opportunities, lost love and shattered relationships.

Subscribing to the "less is more" theory, The Boys carefully layer their debut with delicately strummed acoustic guitar, soft, passionate vocals and gentle hints of lap steel and mandolin. The effect is breathtaking — a collection of songs that are both sparse as well as emotionally packed; somber yet immediately demand your complete attention.

"I can count the love you gave me on one hand," quietly sings guitarist Joe Pernice on the track "One Hand." Pernice fills Dance The Night Away with these stark confessionals in his haunting and distant voice that accents, rather than overpower, the band's tranquil sound.

While the dulcful vocals on the album certainly lend to the Scud Mountain Boy's appeal, their greatest asset may be the ability to conjure powerful feelings within the cracks of their songs. A fleeting moment of silence, or a drawn out echo of pedal steel often express more than any number of words ever could.

Out of the 15 tracks on Dance The Night Away, only two represent the band's earlier, more rocking style (when they were known as just The Scuds). Both the southern stomp of "(She Took His) Picture" as well as the low-down boogie of "Helen" provide an emotional life preserver from the band's often deep musical sorrow, as well as show off a lighter side to the group that was previously unseen.

But still the Scud Mountain Boys are at their best when they wear their broken hearts on their sleeves. Tracks such as the hushed shuffle of "Sweet Sally," the ominous folk of "Silo," and the country and western balladry of "Freight Of Fire" are all testament to the band's often brilliant, but always mesmerizing songwriting.

Though the band has obvious roots in the quickly fading world of country blues it is impossible to pigeonhole their sound into one distinct category. It is just as easy to pick out a healthy pop influence in songs such as "Letter To Bread" and "Where's The Playground Susie?" as it is to hear the twang and remorse of country music's greatest. This capability to seamlessly mesh certain styles and transcend genres, yet still keep their feet firmly rooted in traditional songwriting, is what makes the Scud Mountain Boys' sound so refreshing and Dance The Night Away such an instant classic.

For now it seems that the Scud Mountain Boys will remain Northampton's best kept secret, but with such an impressive collection of songs already under their belt that may all soon change.

Already Dance The Night Away has proven itself to be one of the new year's most rewarding releases. A

Holiday movie season leaves Little to be desired

Nell, Dumb and Dumber hit low points for winter flicks

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

COURTESY JOSEPH LEDERER

Claire Danes, Trini Alvarado, Winona Ryder and Kirsten Dunst star in Little Women.

The Christmas season proved to be a less-than-stellar finish to a less-than-stellar year, filled with star-vanity projects (Nell), crummy romantic comedies (Speechless, I.Q.) and lots of lame jokes (Houseguest, Mixed Nuts, A Low Down Dirty Shame). Here's a look at five of the holiday's biggest releases, including one winner and plenty of losers.

LITTLE WOMEN
Directed by Gillian Armstrong with Winona Ryder, Susan Sarandon

Remakes of this stellar sort make the very idea of remakes seem positively thrilling. Gillian Armstrong's (My Brilliant Career) vivid, emotional adaptation of Alcott's legendary novel is the third screen version, and it's also the best.

Eschewing the static notions that usually plague period costume dramas, Armstrong captures the enchanting spirit of the novel, turning a quaint, sentimental story about a group of sisters into an entertaining parable of pride, womanhood and a decidedly un-Republican notion of family values.

The strong cast is lead by Winona Ryder as the headstrong Jo March, anchored by Susan Sarandon's wonderfully inspiring Marmee and filled with marvelous performances by Claire Danes (TV's "My So-Called Life") as the sickly Beth and Christian Bale (Swing Kids) as the innocently rakish Laurie.

Women doesn't miss a beat when in the March household, and only Jo's trip to New York City (where she meets up with an expatriate German professor played by Gabriel Byrne) rings false. But that's mere nit-picking when you're dealing with the level of charming mythmaking involved here — if Women can warm the heart of this cold-hearted cynic, it can for anyone. A

NELL
Directed by Michael Apted
with Jodie Foster, Liam Neeson

There's nary a honest emotion or moment in all of Nell, but there are plenty of goofy ones. There's something inherently vain and silly in having two-time Oscar winner Foster glam-down and start cackling and waving her hands like some sort of Appalachian Rain Man, all the while having Liam Neeson (Schindler's List) and Natasha Richardson (Widow's Peak) fawn and fight over her like she's their illegitimate wild child.

COURTESY KERRY HAYES

Aidan Quinn, Henry Thomas and Brad Pitt star in Legends Of The Fall.

The film starts off fairly innocuously, but by the time Nell starts taking midnight dips au naturel and delivering a highly improbable and highly silly courtroom monologue (interpreted by Neeson with a clunky earnestness last seen in Schindler's dopey farewell speech: "This earring in my nose . . . two more people!"), the movie has well worn out its effectiveness.

There's also a tacked-on ending ("Five years later . . .") that stretches its credibility to the point of a Lifetime movie of the week.

And despite Foster's subtle-as-neon Oscar bid, there is something undeniably memorable about hearing her exclaim "Missa missa chickabay poo-poo" or whatever in Dolby Surround Sound. If only there was an Oscar for that. C-

LEGENDS OF THE FALL
Directed by Ed Zwick
with Brad Pitt, Anthony Hopkins

The story is sprawling, the music booming, and Brad Pitt's mane is flowing in Ed Zwick's (Glory) ham-fisted epic. Detailing the decidedly convoluted life of a hearty family of Montana ranchers, Legends is a dandy enough pop confection with emphasis on the pop — there isn't a hard- edged moment in the movie. Which is fine if you're looking for easy-to-swallow escapism — the movie delivers its almost swollen angst with heapings of Hollywood style.

There is the problem of a hilariously overacted turn by Anthony Hopkins and the inept delivery of Aidan Quinn (after this and Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, Quinn should be barred from anything pre-1950).

Pitt's as good as gold though, proving he's more adept at being a sullen (though hunky) movie star than any sort of actor, even elevating Julia Ormond's so-so performance to giddy heights of romantic melodrama — if only because James Horner's thunderously obvious score keeps telling us so.

And yet if the movie slowed down or shut up for a moment, the audience may just realize what a dizzying crock the whole thing is. B-

DUMB AND DUMBER
Directed by Peter Farrelly with Jim Carrey, Jeff Daniels

Indeed. D

READY TO WEAR (PRET A PORTER)
Directed by Robert Altman with Julia Roberts, Tim Robbins

It's an irresistible premise: what Robert Altman did to war in *M*A*S*H* and to Hollywood in The Player was what he was going to do to the fashion industry in Ready to Wear.

Unfortunately, all the stars in the heavens can't save Altman's latest multi-character farce from being a rambling, toothless thud of a satire more like a star-studded "Love Boat" (sans Gopher) than the crackling satire of Nashville.

What's the use of having stars like Julia Roberts, Tim Robbins, Sophia Loren, Stephen Rea, et. al., if all they're going to do is stumble through a grade-school plot stitched together with what appears to be band-aids?

Most of this could be excused if the jokes were funny, but Ready to Wear plays curiously flat; its idea of a clever running gag is having characters keep stepping in dog crap. Sadly, there's nothing to recommend — the emperor has no clothes. D+ to see him teamed up with a bunch of Sumo wrestler-types to pulverize the villains, rescue a couple of sexy chicks and even take a couple of quick snack brakes between punches.

On the same network, I also saw a glimpse of the long awaited "Star Trek: Voyager" which featured it's first female captain. Trekkies (or Trekkers, or whatever) should like the wealth of eccentric characters, as well as the cheerfully corny scenes of old fashioned sci-fi melodrama.

And even though I'm not actually a device of "Star Trek" phenomena, I still thought that star Kate Mulgrew (who took over the Captain's chair after Genevieve Bujold abdicated) did a very respectable job delivering her requisite quasi-technical nonsense monologues without even cracking a smile. Geez, she's tough.

The new WB network was somewhat less successful with it's launching of "Unhappily Ever After," a sitcom about divorce that's too willing to steal most of it's gags from Fox's "Married...With Children." Stephanie Hodge (formerly of NBC's "Nurses") isn't bad as the bitter ex-wife, but the actor who plays dad spends too much time imitating Al Bundy and not enough time working to develop his own character.

The writing is snippy and occasionally humorous, but nevertheless the show turns out to be not much more than a cheap rip-off.

I must admit, however that there is one wholly original element that concerns the bizarre casting of comedian Bobcat Goldthwait as . . . uh, a stuffed bunny. More specifically, a stuffed bunny that comes to life.

It's one of the weirdest cameos I've seen in a long time, and while it doesn't make a whole lot of sense in terms of advancing plot, he's still good for a few laughs.

But as unoriginal as most of "Unhappily Ever After" was, it was nowhere near as painful to watch as WB's "The Wayan Bros." You'd think that some of the creative spirit of "In Living Color" (another Wayan's family project) would have shown up here, but it hasn't.

I mean, jokes involving mysterious hair products were old even when "The Brady Bunch" pulled them off 20 years ago.

I think the most pathetic moment during the pilot episode came when embarrassed-looking guest star Gary Coleman (would I kid about something like this?) was reduced to squirming around the floor after his tonic laden hair began emitting strange puffs of flour, presumably a low-budget substitute for fire. I felt so sorry for Gary. It probably would have been less humiliating for him to have sold pencils on a street corner than to participate in this disaster.

Now, on to Oprah. I don't mean to sound insensitive or anything, but does anybody really care that she did drugs two decades ago? I mean, are people going to stop watching her show because she did some dumb things in her youth? I thought it was generally agreed that Oprah had a pretty crummy life as a young woman, and that it was old news.

If people are so shocked about the things Oprah used to do, imagine the heart attacks that people would be having if they knew about all the sordid stuff that some celebrities are doing now.

But alas, I now have some sad news to report.

It seems that ABC is fed up with getting slaughtered every Thursday night by the invincible NBC prime-time line-up, and has decided to take action by pulling the plug on one of this season's best dramas, "My So-Called Life."

Execs have not officially cancelled the show as of this writing, but when a program has its "season finale" in January, rest assured that it's not a good sign. My gratitude goes out to the producers, writers and actors (particularly Wilson Cruz, for his groundbreaking portrayal of a gay teen) for making such first-rate programming.

On a happier note, I was very glad to hear that Michael Moore's hilarious news-magazine satire "TV Nation" has been picked up by the Fox Network, after being all but dumped by the rather prudish head honchos at NBC.

Oh, and there's one more thing. It's got to do with Cosmo. You know. Cosmo Kramer. About the name, I think I kind of like it. It seems to embody his surreal incomprehensibility and a kind of indefinable other-worldliness. All things considered, it's a pretty weird name. Not, of course that there's anything wrong with that.

Frank Black

Black offers return to form at Pearl St.

FRANK BLACK
Pearl Street
Jan. 19

The music world has undergone drastic changes in the three and a half years since The Pixies released their final album, Trompe Le Monde, but two weeks ago in Northampton it seemed like, for Frank Black, very little had changed at all.

As the frontman for The Pixies, Frank Black (then known as Black Francis) proved to be one of the most gifted and influential songwriters of the last 10 years.

Now, on his own, he continues to write and perform music with the same unique flare for the bazaar that has made him alternative rock's most unlikely icon.

On Jan. 19, Frank and his latest backing band returned to his old stomping grounds to tear through a brief but inspired set at Pearl Street.

Fans who may have been expecting a set list full of old Pixies songs were surprised to discover not a single one to be found. Instead, Frank chose to focus entirely on material from his two solo albums, a decision which proved to be more than successful in the highly competent hands of his newly formed line-up.

The band's greatest strength was their tight, straightforward approach to the material. Songs which, on album, have a slick, somewhat over-produced sound were broken down to their basic elements and performed (sans keyboards) with a raw intensity which the studio versions fail to capture.

From the deep space arena rock of "Czar" to the over-the- top punk barrage of "Whatever Happened To Pong?" the band displayed a versatility and enthusiasm to which the crowd responded in kind, jumping, slamming and dancing non-stop from beginning to end.

In terms of subject matter, the songs were characteristically offbeat, covering such diverse topics as John Candy, Mexican jumping beans and (of course) aliens.

The last song of the night, "Rockabye," was a surprisingly tranquil serenade reminiscent of Neil Young which served as a perfect denouement for such a markedly unreserved set.

Despite an interminable one-hour delay between acts and technical difficulties which forced the band to forego an encore, the show was a memorable one in which the quality of the music more than made up for these drawbacks.

By putting on such a solid performance in a small setting like Pearl Street, Frank Black reaffirmed his integrity and relevance in today's musical climate. Two years after the break-up of The Pixies, Frank Black proved that he continues to hold on to the same passion and vision that made that band Boston's greatest musical export.

Designers commemorate old–fashioned glamour with 'retro' motifs & '40s flair

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Like the endless lists of resolutions that people make whenever the ball drops in Times Square, fashion designers do their best to make the beginnings of each year start off with something fresh, new and exciting. This year is no exception to the rule and the runways have never looked so sassy.

Fashion is an art and an attitude. Runway shows can make or break a young or old designer's heart. It's big bucks, smart looks and brand names. "Retro? What's that?" might sound cool, but amongst the circus like atmosphere in Milan, London and Paris it was like stepping up and back to the past.

Six months of work and hundreds of thousands of dollars are doled out for a few hours of tension and backstage frenzy. Even music helps add to the hype. Songs are chosen to set the mood and the flavor of the collection. Ralph Lauren favors Sinatra while Lagerfeld struts to 20 Fingers.

Peri is a plus with this year's kaleidoscope of new lines. Designers like Dior, Karan and Klein featured clothing that was meant to cling, wrap and reveal. Short skirts and shorts emphasized well toned legs while slinky ankle wrapping sandals had models tottering on well turned ankles.

Madonna seemed to be the first one to bear her bra to the world and designers still haven't quite gotten over it. Reaching back into great grandma's press closet, the corset takes center stage and is paired with anything and everything.

Dolce & Gabbana featured several slim suits with skirts modestly grazing the knee but leaving jackets gaped open to reveal Maidenforms. Ostentations by Richard Tyler, Lagerfeld and Prada all displayed savoir faire with short shorts in satin, Lycra and leather paired with formal suit jackets and plunging underwire bras. Also a beau monde among the trio was sheer black blouses, halter tops and skirts that cover all and revealed everything with gauze and lace.

Shiny satin was a haute material and was confected into skirts, jackets, shirts, robes and glamorous night rail looking gowns. White seemed to be 100 percent pure enough for Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein who focused on sensuality.

Yet to offset this somewhat sterile color came a montage of color from fire engine red that screamed "look at me" to lime light green. Todd Oldham, Rifet Ozbek and Jean Paul Gaultier all blazed the runways with hip hugging eye blinding creations from tank dresses with showy shoulder pads to trapeze coats and floppy hats.

Bathing suits were also flaunted by Isaac Mizrahi, timeless Chanel and Herve Leger (famous for his ribbon style dresses). Again the key word was "retro" as many of the suits looked like creations from a Gidget re-run or costumes for Beach Blanket Bingo.

Wrap around skirts and cardigans with spaghetti thin straps called to mind delicate apron strings. Slim pants, cropped tees, backless mules and A-line shorts paired with super thin belts all recall the simple grace of Hepburn and Kelly.

Yet behind all '40s glamour peered a sourpuss '90s edge. Hair was slicked back and lips pouted blood red or blackberry mauve. Nails were short trimmed and on fire or sinking in inky blackness.

Designers turn back time to capture '40s glamour in their new collections

Clarke brings gritty rock to NoHo

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Playing guitar in a band such as Guns N' Roses can cause a musician to be lumped into that band's particular sound, but such is not the case with the ex- GN'R axeman Gilby Clarke. Clarke, who just recently decided to part ways with rock n' roll's most temperamental bad boys, will be playing Pearl Street Nightclub on Feb. 2 in support of his debut solo recording Pawn Shop Guitars.

Clarke's career in the music business extends far back before joining the ranks of GN'R, playing in various garage bands since he was in high school. Later he found himself in Los Angeles playing local bars and winning over fans with his unique style of guitar-orientated rock before being recruited as a "ghost guitarist," reworking guitar parts in the studio for popular bands whose chops weren't up to par.

Two bands, Candy and Kills For Thrills, served as Clarke's first attempts at breaking into the mainstream on his own, but it wasn't until he got the call to replace friend Izzy Stradlin on the Guns N' Roses Use Your Illusion tour that the mainstream got its first real taste of his ability.

Clarke spent three years with GN'R, appearing on the Spaghetti Incident album, but all the while never losing sight of his own creativity. The result of his vision is Pawn Shop Guitars, an album of hard rocking pop songs laced with a bluesy, bar band crunch. Guitars features Clarke's own band as well as support from all of the members of Guns N' Roses. Skid Row drummer Rob Affuso and ex-Pixie frontman Frank Black.

In addition to nine original compositions, Clarke also offers covers of "Dead Flowers" by the Rolling Stones and the Clash's "Jail Guitar Doors."

Although aided by his former GN'R bandmates, Pawn Shop Guitars is clearly Clarke's own style — one that has dirt under its fingernails but at the same time has the grace and style to pull off surprisingly unaggressive harmonies.

This combined with the fact that Clarke utilizes everything from piano to a fiddle and jews harp gives his music a fresh approach to what has been passed off as rock n' roll in the past few years.

With such an impressive debut and the popularity of the singles "Cure Me Or Kill Me" and "Tijuana Jail" steadily on the rise, Clarke's stop at Pearl Street should prove to be a return to rock music's roots and remind us what made the whole thing so fun to begin with.

Gilby Clarke will play Pearl Street Nightclub on Feb. 2. Call Pearl Street at 584-7771 for more info.

Sunrise

show that he can carry a picture without relying solely on his too-cool-for-words image (I hope Keanu is taking notes).

Delpy manages to redeem herself after a disastrous performance in Roger Avary's Killing Zoe with a dreamy yet believable performance that manages to be both sensitive yet assertive at the same time.

While Before Sunrise does not really rank with Linklater's previous films it is nevertheless an impressive and extremely challenging piece of work. The film definitely has more of an art house feel to it with it's extended dialogues and preposterously long camera shots, making it a much closer kin to the likes of Slacker than the more typical narrative of Dazed And Confused.

Linklater still seems a little too concerned with trying to secure his place in the Generation X director's chair, but unlike fellow autour of the moment Quentin Tarantino – who seems content with recycling his own ideas – Linklater is willing to take chances. And that's cool no generational label can buy. B+

bashing and about how horrible it is and how you have to grease both ends and everyone's cynical about Hollywood," he said. "But to tell you the truth, this script was out there in the independent channels and people were turning it down. And then I showed it to these guys who did A Few Good Men and In The Line of Fire and they were like 'this is a good film' and they were very intelligent and very supportive."

Now 33, Linklater is a little older and a little bit wiser, but still the same person he's always been: unsure, but ambitious. Yet, with co-stars Delpy and Hawke combining their talents in Before Sunrise it seems impossible that Linklater will fail.

Linklater hopes that Before Sunrise opens people up to what relationships are like. He wants the audience to be aware of Jesse and Celine as two people in an often common situation, not just characters trying to make some overall point. Linklater felt that the dialogue was the tool that enabled viewers to see that connection.

"The take [on the bus] was so long that after a while you found yourself really talking and really listening," said Hawke. "It's like the first rule in acting."

"I feel that for more than one minute [of filming] you forget the cameras and it's really better because you get into it," added Delpy.

Now that he has become a somewhat seasoned director, Linklater knows the value of believing in one's ideas and taking a chance. Almost all of Slacker's budget was borrowed from friends and family. Even the camera dolly was "on loan" from a local television station.

"Trust your instincts and your impulses," he advised. "You know, you can hear your Mom's voice from kindergarten saying, 'Don't talk to strangers!' and yet she [Celine] said 'yes' and it turned out to be a positive thing."

Perhaps the most important thing that Linklater emphasized for would–be filmmakers is that it isn't just luck and a prayer, but self–discipline and separating want from need. It's a business that takes common sense, savvy and a heavy dose of realism to make dreams fly.

"You have to make sacrifices if you want to make films. I have no sympathy for those young filmmakers that say, 'Oh, it's so expensive buying all that film and developing it.' Yet they go and take a ski vacation or buy a new car," said Linklater.

"When I saw a film like Raging Bull I said, 'My god this is amazing,' but I wasn't going to go out tomorrow and do a thing like that. But when I saw something like Chance Listening, like a low budget film shot in your own neighborhood and then I said, 'You know I can do that' and it puts you closer."

Linklater also made it clear that Before Sunrise isn't about a specific time period or a certain "generation," but rather a film about details and the small things in life that people most remember or forget.

"Words like 'generation' belittle the individual. This film is about individuals," explains Linklater. "I never saw this film in terms of 'generation' at all. We really cut away a lot of that. This film could have been made 50 years ago."

Heels were stiletto, boas were feathered, and seams graced the back of shapely stocking clad legs. Veils and hats disguised a well placed pout, gloves covered arms to the elbow and skirts flirted dangerously close to the knee.

Attitude is everything to some and most of the supermodels that carry off the look of smoldering sexuality trapped in the clothing of Girl Friday.

Claudia, Helena and Cindy all have the body types to carry off this all woman person and because the designers are looking for the sensualist in everyone, even would be waifs Shalom, Kate or Trish Goff can look tempting. False eyelashes, exaggerated lips and highlighted cheek bones all help to create that comic hither look so many designers were striving to embody.

And if you don't have it– fake it.

The market has been deluged with undergarments infused with lycra and boning to push, pull, plump, flatten, enhance, hide and reveal every thing Mother Nature gave or might have forgotten.

Amendment will grant rent review for two years

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — An amendment passed at a special town meeting gives off-campus students a ray of hope concerning rent review, and forebodes future lobbying efforts.

In a special town meeting last Monday an amendment was voted in and added to proposed legislation requesting the state legislature to allow rent review in Amherst for two more years. The town select board, the town finance committee and a quorum of a 121 Town Meeting members all attended the Monday-night meeting held at Amherst Junior High School.

"Students are going to have to do a tremendous lobbying effort along with the town to get this bill passed," said Joanne Levenson, co-chair of the Fair Housing Task Force for the town of Amherst.

Now that the legislation has passed Town Meeting, the students of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst must take it to the state house, Levenson said.

"I have mixed feelings about it," according to Carolyn Holstein, member of the select board of the town of Amherst. "As a matter of principle it should be there, but now we are running a huge risk that the whole thing will get thrown out because that amendment is there."

Amherst's state legislators should concentrate on other problems and question whether or not excluding students is constitutional, Holstein said.

All rent control in Massachusetts was abolished last November with the passing of Question 9. Cambridge, Boston and Brookline were the only communities which received two year extensions, which are in place to protect those who are financially at risk. The extensions in Boston, Cambridge and Brookline exclude students.

Monday night's amendment changed the proposed legislation so that qualifying students will continue to be covered by rent review.

Cyr found guilty in 1993 Tara Hartnett murder

Judith and Edward Hartnett wait for the verdict to be handed down by the jury yesterday at Franklin Superior Court in Greenfield.

By Darienne J. Hosley
Collegian Staff

GREENFIELD — James R. Cyr Jr. was found guilty yesterday of first-degree murder in the March 1993 death of University of Massachusetts senior Tara Hartnett.

Cyr, 24, of Amherst, received the mandatory sentence of life imprisonment without parole.

He was also convicted on a charge of arson and sentenced to 18 to 20 years, to be served concurrently.

Before the sentencing by Judge William Welch in Franklin Superior Court, a former housemate of Hartnett's said she would favor the death sentence if it were available in Massachusetts.

"James Cyr Jr. should be in jail for life — not just for 20 to 30 years but until he draws his very last breath," said Dawn Melchionda, who graduated from UMass in 1993.

"This is a living nightmare, one I will never wake up from," she said.

Cyr was found not guilty of first-degree murder committed with extreme atrocity or cruelty.

"See you later, James," said Tara Hartnett's mother, Judith, as Cyr was led out of the courtroom.

Custody battle

The jury deliberated for only 3_ hours before reaching their verdict, rejecting the defense's argument for a finding of manslaughter rather than premeditated first-degree murder.

A manslaughter conviction would have carried a maximum sentence of 20 years.

Cyr admitted in court Monday that he repeatedly stabbed his former girlfriend on March 20, 1993, poured gasoline throughout the Sunderland home she shared with five other people and then set the building ablaze.

Hartnett died of smoke inhalation.

The 22-year-old senior psychology major was the mother of his then 11-month-old baby girl. Hartnett was killed one day after she went to court to request custody of their daughter.

Her parents, Edward and Judith Hartnett of South Boston, now have custody of the girl, Meghan Marie Hartnett. Her middle name was changed to that of her slain mother's.

"It's a bittersweet happiness," said Judith Hartnett of the verdict. "When I used to visit her grave site, all I could say was, 'We'll get him.' And we got him."

Hartnett's five former housemates have all graduated from the University. After listening to yesterday's verdict, some of them visited the Hartnett memorial in the UMass Campus Center.

Changed story

Defense attorney Richard Rubin argued that the murder was not premeditated but spontaneously occurred in "the heat of passion" after Hartnett attacked Cyr with a knife.

But Assistant Franklin County District Attorney David Angier said Cyr was an "obsessive father" who could not handle losing custody of his daughter.

Cyr, who attended UMass from 1991 to 1992, originally denied involvement in the murder.

In court on Monday, he said he only wanted to talk with Hartnett the night he killed her.

Cyr testified he walked to Hartnett's house that night and concealed his car because he did not want to be seen there, since Hartnett had a restraining order against him.

When Hartnett refused to let him in, Cyr said, he stuck his foot in the door and pushed his way in. Hartnett began screaming and ran to the kitchen to get a knife, he said.

He defended himself with his hands, he said, disarmed Hartnett and followed her to the bathroom where he started stabbing her in a rage.

Cyr said he did not know how many times he struck her but he testified she

UMass graduate lands gov't position

Holyoke native appointed to federal highway administration

By Matthew Wurtzel

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A University of Massachusetts graduate is climbing the ladder of success in the Beltway.

Sharon M. Kennedy, a Holyoke native, has recently been appointed Special Assistant to the Director of Public Affairs and Deputy Director of News Services at the Federal Highway Administration in Washington, D.C.

Kennedy's job at the highway administration will utilize her skills with the press.

The highway administration was founded under President Eisenhower when he established the plans for today's interstate highway system. The highway administration's mission is to promote economic vitality through a strong transportation infrastructure.

"We are delighted to have Sharon join the FHWA staff, where her knowledge of federal, state, and local governments, as well as her media relations experience is particularly valuable," Federal Highway Administrator Rodney E. Slater said.

Kennedy began in politics and government in 1992 when President Clinton ran for office.

"I felt that Bush was not directing the country in the right direction," Kennedy said. "I felt Governor Clinton would make real changes."

While on the campaign trail, Kennedy was a press liaison who travelled in advance of the Clintons and made arrangements with the press before they arrived.

Following Clinton's victory in November 1992, Kennedy worked on the presidential transition team. While on the transition team she worked as a liaison to the media.

In 1993 after the transition team, Kennedy was appointed to the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs and the First Lady where she worked as a scheduler for the First Lady, and she arranged meetings between governors and mayors with the president.

While at Intergovernmental Affairs, she also travelled in advance of the Clintons both nationally and internationally.

Kennedy travelled to Naples, Italy to coordinate media relations at the 1994 G-7 Economic Summit of the seven economic superpowers.

Kennedy said the University's size gives graduates an advantage in the real world over individuals from small private schools because of the immense size.

Kennedy said the University is a superb school which is overlooked by many Massachusetts residents. She said she enjoyed her years at the University.

"UMass gave me the education I needed to succeed in the classroom and the real world," Kennedy said.

Kennedy received a bachelor's degree in management from the school of management in 1987.

Weld seeks $10m higher ed cut

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld's recently-proposed budget for fiscal 1996 would cut higher education by $10 million.

The new budget would cut money for universities and colleges, but the Weld administration said they are setting up a grant program allowing them to recoup the money if they raise the same amount from donors.

The new budget, introduced late last week, is intended to give tax breaks for taxpayers like parents, military contractors and certain types of businesses.

Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) said the governor's budget usually changes from its original form when it goes through the legislation.

"Hopefully, there will be more money for higher education," said Story.

"We have to fight not to lose ground."

Story said the University of Massachusetts is still below financial figures from 1988.

"The cuts were so severe after 1988, we have not brought them up," said Story.

"That's not even counting for inflation."

John Feudo, executive director of the University of Massachusetts Alumni Association, said he could not speak on behalf of the alumni fund-raising, but said, speaking as alumni, the university cannot take another budget cut.

"We need our state supporting us, cutting our budget is unacceptable," Feudo said. "We can't survive."

However, Fuedo said it is difficult to argue with where the money would go after the cuts, namely additional funding for public schools (K-12).

Weld would also fatten the increase in lottery revenues and police personnel and equipment, including 212 new State Police cars.

Originally, Weld had proposed a $25 million cut for higher education.

"He was just testing the waters," Story said.

"He is very conscious of public opinion. Plus, after $25 million, $10 million wouldn't sound so bad."

Story said it is very important for students, faculty and staff to get involved.

"We have a long way to go," Story said.

University of Massachusetts President Michael Hooker will be releasing a formal statement concerning the 1996 budget on Wednesday, after a meeting with the Board of Trustees.

Clinton devises new $20 billion aid package for Mexican relief

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Facing unyielding opposition in Congress, President Clinton scrapped a $40 billion rescue plan for Mexico Tuesday and hurriedly assembled a substitute package combining U.S. money with international aid. "We cannot risk further delay," Clinton said.

Racing against what the administration said was the imminent threat of financial default by Mexico, Clinton invoked presidential authority to commit $20 billion for loans and loan guarantees to the government of President Ernesto Zedillo.

"The situation was dire in Mexico," Secretary of State Warren Christopher said, commenting on Monday's plunge in the value of the peso. Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said "the likelihood is very high" that the new aid will avert a financial catastrophe.

Mexican financial markets and the peso rallied Tuesday after Clinton's announcement.

International lenders increased their aid pledges by $15 billion, to a total of $27.8 billion. Canada and a group of Latin American countries pledged $1 billion apiece.

The end run around Congress was a gamble for Clinton, drawing on money that usually would be used to defend the value of the U.S. dollar. It also means he shoulders most of the political risk of supporting Mexico's nose-diving peso rather than sharing it with Congress.

"This is in the interest of America, contrary to what some have said," Clinton asserted, answering criticism that his proposals amount to a bailout for U.S. banks and Wall Street investors with millions tied up in Mexican bonds.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole joined Democratic leaders in endorsing Clinton's move. "This is an important undertaking and we believe that the risks of inaction vastly exceed any risks associated with this action," the leaders said in a joint statement released at the White House.

GOP: Reorganize the Job Corps

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans demanded Tuesday that the Clinton administration make immediate changes in the Job Corps program, which they said is beset by drug abuse and violence and is not proving its worth.

In a letter to Labor Secretary Robert Reich, Sen. Nancy Kassebaum (R-Kan)., who chairs the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, said recent hearings uncovered serious shortcomings in the program.

"Violence, drug abuse and other unacceptable behavior among students continues unchecked at many Job Corps centers, while performance measures, to the extent they exist, are below acceptable standards," wrote Kassebaum, who was joined by GOP Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio and Judd Gregg of New Hampshire.

Among the letter's recommendations are an immediate halt to expansion of the Job Corps, a product of President Johnson's war on poverty that now operates at 111 centers.

About 60,000 poor, mostly minority people aged 16 to 24 are enrolled yearly in the program's job training and remedial education courses. They also get room and board at the centers. The senators want the Labor Department to do a better job of weeding out students who use drugs, are prone to violence or have emotional problems.

They said the committee's hearings uncovered poor or misleading measurements of whether Job Corps students actually get meaningful jobs. They called for immediate, independent evaluations of centers that are not performing well.

"We urge you to act swiftly to assure that the well-being of the students, as well as the program itself, are not further jeopardized by the current mismanagement at many Job Corps centers," the GOP senators told Reich in the letter dated Monday.

During the hearings earlier this month, Job Corps officials said many of the concerns raised were already being dealt with. But they also cautioned that no one should expect perfection from a program that helps people from America's poorest towns and neighborhoods.

Assistant Labor Secretary Doug Ross said Tuesday the department believes its performance has been greatly improved in recent months. He said three-quarters of Job Corps students either get jobs or go on to higher education.

■ rent review

Rent review in Amherst is a process where tenants who feel their rent is too high can appeal to the Housing Review Board. The board would then examine all variables they feel apply and decide on whether the landlord is making too much profit, Holstein said. The Board has not heard a case in three years.

If the legislation passes, the amendment will allow students who are recipients of Aid to Families with Dependant Children, Social Security or supplemental Security Income benefits, state Veterans' Assistance benefits, Food Stamps, Medical Assistance ("Medicaid") or is a recipient of federal or state need-based financial aid to continue to be protected under rent review.

State Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst), cautioned members of the town meeting that the further the legislation broadens the scope of the anti-rent-control bill, the less chance it has of passing.

Four graduate students spoke to Story, along with the rest of Town Meeting, in a plea to include them in the legislation.

There were reminders that this meeting was only the first step, and anything done then could be vetoed to be greatly changed before it was passed.

"If [Amherst] wants to be included we have to be as careful as we can be," said Holstein.

Story said she agreed with the principle behind the legislation and the amendment which was added, yet was doubtful of it's impact on the state house.

"People will not care that little Amherst wants to change this. It will be quick and easy and the answer will be no," said Story. "These are people in need, but in my best judgement, this will not pass."

Speakers who followed, warned that the government can simply veto the part of the legislation that includes students if it is not to their liking.

Freshman athletic standards in question

New proposition would alter the requirements for student-athlete admission

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

The National College Athletics Association met recently at their January convention to discuss Proposition 16, which would revise the guidelines for freshman eligibility outlined in Proposition 48.

The new proposition would change the standards needed for incoming freshmen student-athletes to play in their first season.

Currently, athletes need to obtain a 2.0 grade-point average in at least 11 core courses in high school and achieve a minimum score of 700 on the SAT or 17 on the ACT. The core courses include three English classes, two math, two social sciences, two natural sciences and two other courses.

Prop 16 would raise the number of required core courses to 13. It would also raise the GPA required on those courses to 2.75 and an SAT score of 600, or an ACT score of 15.

A new proposal would also allow athletes who do not meet these requirement to have four years of eligibility instead of three if they make progress towards getting a degree.

Both proposals would become effective for athletes entering college on or after August 1, 1996.

Opposition to the plan

There was some opposition to the plan however. The Black Coaches Association opposed this plan and said that all athletes should be ineligible to play during their freshman year.

Rob Talley, the outside linebacker coach and special teams coordinator, is a member of the BCA.

According to Talley, the BCA's plan would clear up some problems about eligibility.

"It gives kids a chance to get used to the school. We try to redshirt all freshmen, although we don't always succeed," Talley said.

Ineligibility would give students time to adapt. They would still have to concentrate on their sport, but wouldn't have the mental pressure of worrying about games, Talley said.

Asked how it would affect some programs, Talley said that it "It might hurt some programs that need a freshman right away," Talley said.

"It will be real tough because of the lesser number of players. They would have problems even fielding a team."

These circumstances would call for an increase in the number of scholarships, which probably will not happen, according to Talley.

The UMass men's basketball assistant coach James "Bruiser" Flint, who is not part of the BCA disagreed.

"I see their point. Why not make everyone ineligible if you're going to make someone ineligible?" Flint said.

> "If everyone is on the same scale educationally you can make rules like that, but they're not. Everyone doesn't have the same educational background. ...To be honest, I don't mind Prop 48..."
> — James "Bruiser" Flint

"If everyone is on the same scale educationally you can make rules like that, but they're not," Flint said. "Everyone doesn't have the same educational background."

Rules like that are likely to affect some groups more than others, because of the education athletes receive in high school, Flint said.

"I've had kids do better in college than high school, because we prepare them here," Flint said.

Part of the team

"To be honest with you, I don't mind Prop 48 although I'm glad they brought back the scholarships," Flint said.

Another new NCAA rule establishes that partial qualifiers can now practice with the team and receive athletic aid even though they can not play. A partial-qualifier is a student- athlete who either did not get a 2.75 GPA in the core classes, or got below a 600 SAT or 15 ACT.

A non-qualifier is now eligible to receive non-athletic institutional financial aid based upon need. A non-qualifier is one who does not get above a 2.75 and a 600 on the SAT, or 15 on the ACT.

Flint said before the rules made it so the athlete wasn't a part of the team. "It was like taking an arm away from the kid," he said.

David Wechsler, 19, student

University of Massachusetts freshman David Wechsler committed suicide about a week before returning to school, said his father.

According to Wechsler's father, Wechsler, originally from Hingham, drove to New Jersey to get away from people he knew.

Weschler was found on Jan. 19, his father said the police believe he committed suicide on Jan. 18.

Weschler lived on the fourth floor of Brown residence hall in the Sylvan residential area.

tried to get away when she collapsed in front of her bedroom.

When arrested shortly after the killing, Cyr had told police his hands were cut when a stranger opened his car door at a red light in Amherst and attacked him.

No gasoline in house

Cyr said he thought she was dead when he poured gasoline around her and the house to conceal the large amounts of blood, some of it his, on the scene. He also said he did not think of burning Hartnett and her house until he saw a gasoline can inside an open garage door.

But Hartnett's roommates and the owner of the house testified earlier there was no gasoline in the home.

Rubin said he had a witness to prove there was gasoline in the garage, but that witness was not called to the stand Monday.

Fred Bixby, a Leverett police officer who was the first person to respond the scene, and a state police officer both testified that the garage doors were closed.

Defense attorney Rubin said he expects to appeal the conviction. The judge rejected Rubin's request that Cyr spend the night in Franklin County House of Correction for time with his family and instead sent him immediately to Cedar Junction state prison in the eastern part of the state.

Students chosen to receive $1,000 grants

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Volunteers Involved in Vital Action will come alive on campus this semester.

VIVA, a community service council at the University of Massachusetts, has chosen six students for awards of $1,000 stipends each.

"The most important quality we looked for was dedication to community service," according to Lori McKinney, Community Service Coordinator at the Mather Career Center, and VIVA member.

The application required the organization of a community service project, which must be carried out by the recipient, said Joan Stoia, council co-chair for VIVA.

Project ideas and applicants were reviewed by professors and other members of the organization.

According to Stoia the idea is to get more students involved in community service and to help VIVA grow.

"Applicant projects that engage others in the project were more competitive," Stoia said. "You can't be a VIVA leader if you don't have followers."

Stoia thinks these projects will be a turning point for community service on campus and in the area, she said.

"With these six community service projects, VIVA will grow and more students will become involved, which is one of our goals for the projects," Stoia said.

An example of a recipient project is the organization of and planning this year's community service conference at UMass called "The Big Rally," which will be held on Mar. 1.

According to Stoia, the project will be important to the growth of VIVA.

"This project could be a seed for new student organizations in community service because it will encourage students to get involved," Stoia said.

The awards are not considered scholarships because they do not have to be used for tuition, Stoia said.

"These projects have no budgets, so the recipients may need to use the stipend for project expenses," Stoia said. "With the stipend, recipients will have to work fewer outside jobs, so they can devote more time to their projects, which require 10 to 12 hours each week."

According to McKinney, in addition to focusing on their projects, recipients are required to enroll in and complete Education 615C, Leadership in Community Service.

"The class will be an open forum for the students to discuss progress, problems, ideas, strengths and weaknesses of their projects," said McKinney.

The course will also help the students learn more about community service while they work on their projects said McKinney.

The course will be taught by Stoia and Professor Robert Maloy of the education department.

Applications are being accepted for Collegian librarian and training director.

Librarian must update and maintain electronic library system. Training director oversees recruitment, workshops and training new staff.

No. 1 in more than basketball

Sometimes you have to step outside of your surroundings to get a better perspective on them. A five-week winter break in my happening hometown of just over 15,000 people is as good a time as any to realize this.

I was one of the fortunate few who managed to find work over break, but this "luck" also sucked me back home for what seemed like an indefinite period of time. I spent days at a computer terminal, drafting forms and graphs that meant less to me than the Super Bowl.

Emily Marino

I had been shooting my mouth off to the guys at work about how, regardless of its ranking, UMass was the finest team nationally. I argued about why Lou may have had a bad night (he is human, despite popular belief), how agile Camby is in spite of his size (I'm 5'2" and about as graceful as a frog), how one of the networks reported that Bright got a 3.25 GPA for the fall semester(I hope the Boston Globe's Daniel Golden was watching), and why Coach Calipari is such a motivator (I think it's the origin of his last name).

Talking UMass basketball not only got me off the computer for good stretches of time, but it made me realize just how big the program is throughout Massachusetts. The guys at work (whose ages range from early 20s to mid-50s) knew the players' stats and details about the team better than I did.

My interest in the basketball team is natural, as a student. I have experienced the 6 a.m. lines for tickets, the rush of walking into Mullins and realizing it's ours, and seeing the players around campus, trying to understand how they must cope with their celebrity/student status. But to think that people all over Massachusetts follow UMass basketball (even when we are the underdog) more faithfully than any other East Coast program speaks for the impact the team has had on this region.

Watching the Rutgers game on TV (my dad and I didn't miss a televised game), it hit me that the students' spirit is what makes the UMass basketball team what it is to this campus. The ocean of flannel shirts, baseball caps and maroon and white in the stands raged throughout the entire game in support of its team.

In the dead of winter, in the otherwise unstirring town of Amherst, die-hard fans came out game after game to show their No. 1 team that it's really not all that lonely at the top.

There are a lot of things that the University of Massachusetts at Amherst does not have. We do not have matching buildings, proper lighting or even enough unbroken chairs in our largest auditorium. We don't have any Rhodes Scholars that I know of, nor a guarantee that departments won't be subject to budget cuts that leave majors with few course choices. We don't have wallpaper in our cell-like dorm rooms or food that does much else than sustain life.

We do have a basketball team.

The fact that our basketball team holds the top national spot does not shorten the list of things that our campus lacks. But the strength in this institution is that, in spite of all of its shortcomings, its student body embraces the positive aspects whole-heartedly, and proudly supports them.

Although many departments and organizations at UMass are of the same or better quality as the ones at the most prestigious schools, we will never be a Harvard or Yale. No matter how many UMass alumni and faculty members are Nobel and Pulitzer prize winners, we will always be the state university of Massachusetts in the eyes of the bureaucratic majority.

So while both the students at UMass and that same bureaucratic majority acknowledge the undeniable talent of the men's basketball team, our passion for the team is only the tip of the iceberg. Whether or not we realize it, a lot of students love this school not for the basketball team, but for what it represents.

Every time we see the UMass players on TV we see the Campus Center concourse flooded with boisterous students, the jukebox-blaring Hatch, the beer-guzzling fans at Rafters, the flurry of activity at Haigis Mall, the craziness of the Southwest Towers, fond memories of Curry Hicks Cage, Amherst standby Antonio's, fall afternoons in Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium and that missile-like building we call the library.

We see reflections of our school and of our world in Amherst, and as we cheer for Donta and Lou and the others we see the students' determination to show the country how proud we are to be part of it.

Regardless of how far the Minutemen go this year and where they end up over spring break, during tourney time, we know that No. 1 is not a question of pollsters' opinions.

Life within a bag of potato chips

Yesterday" was the only word in English that the man knew of the song, "Yesterday."

Yesterday....

The dry Mexican sun continued to increase the amount of dust in the air that settled on all the stones and all the buildings in Oaxaca, making them seem an extension of the land itself. As people walked by the dirt was softly kicked up, and collected on the old man singing by our table, gathering in his wrinkles and his clothes and on the worn nylon sting guitar he haphazardly stroked.

Nathan Crick

"No gracias, signor," we said, trying to wave him off.

....in Yesterday.

We let him stay, and ordered another round of Coronas.

In the tree shaded square people were walking around casually, eating corn on a stick or holding one of the many balloons being sold or perhaps stopping at one of the myriad of shoeshine stands to sit and read the newspaper. By the government building, people would stop and look at the group of men lying on the sidewalk under their banners of protest. Nurses would come and take their blood pressure, and make sure their fasting was not killing them.

We gave the old man a few pesos, and he thanked us and moved on. A mime began performing in front of our cafe. He was heavyset and had a big head of black hair, and the only act that he did was walk silently behind people and imitate them. He grew annoying very fast, and I wished he would go away. Instead he sat down at the table next to us and began hitting on some young women who had been peacefully sitting there.

Then a pigeon attacked our peanuts, causing me to flail at the ugly bird in surprise, which in turn sent one of our Corona bottles to sail in a lovely arc over the table to smash loudly on the sidewalk. The mime in the next table started clapping. I made some gesture of acknowledgment and wanted to punch him.

The cathedral in the evening was framed by the night sky and the moon behind its bell tower, with the spotlights running shadows up its face like vines. In front hundreds of silver balloons were being sold by a few women with huge bundles, in front of the necklaces and woodcarvings being sold along the steps.

A symphony was playing in the nearby square. The smell of the hot dogs wafted around, causing me to buy one complete with jalapenos, tomatoes, bacon and some kind of cream. On the wall of the cathedral, posters and news articles were posted and in front a video was playing to the audience of around forty people. The nighttime presentation about the revolution in Chiapas clashed with the string music. People still were eating corn on a stick.

On the other side of the square we noticed a rather odd looking American family. The father had a huge mustache and baggy clothes, and was playing in the street with a potato chip bag. He apparently had some kind of toy within the bag which made it to roll around on its own, which caused the man to pretend he was scared of it. A couple of Mexicans stopped to look at it. When the toy came out of the bag, the man would laugh and pick it up to show to all the Mexicans staring at him. "Papas fritas?" he'd ask.

"Let's go try over there!" said his son, and they all went off to another part of the street to perform their show.

As the night grew old the symphony left, and young couples began to take over the benches and the grassy areas. We began walking back to the hotel, on the way seeing the crazy guy showing his potato chip toy to an old woman selling necklaces, who eyed him warily.

Back at the hotel, the blue lights of the pool reflected off of the dark windows of the two-story hotel rooms which surrounded it. Behind them, dozens of elderly retired American tourists slept, and we'd see them in the morning at breakfast talking about the things they'd buy. The sky was a bubble over this place, sealing out the outside and the Spanish voices of the city. Only the hum of the filter echoed here. Like a life support system, keeping the people safe and alive, or sealed within their potato chip bag.

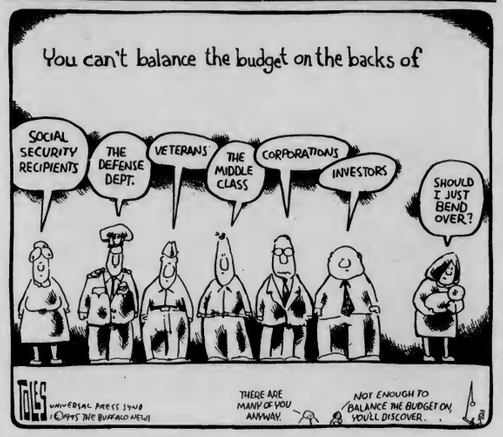
Opinion/Editorial



A frightening trend of repression

Christianity's unwillingness to deal realistically with sexuality is at the root of President Clinton's firing of Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders at the end of 1994. It also is the prime motivation behind the GOP's newly declared unholy war on the poor, especially poor women with children.

The firing — really an effort by Clinton to appease fundamentalists who would like to continue making children feel guilty over the universal human practice of masturbation — as well as victories by the more moralistic elements of the GOP in last November's elections, suggest an impending new era of repression.

Don't bet on it.

The new Puritanism — what columnist George Will approvingly calls a return to "orderly, coherent moral communities," as if such ever really existed in America — will probably turn out to be a mere blip in history.

Attacks by Christian fundamentalists and GOP right-wingers on Joycelyn Elders and on welfare mothers represent a kind of religiously-sanctioned violence which is far from moral.

Richard Gilluly

That's because the sexual revolution that was begun in the early part of this century by such pioneers as Margaret Sanger, and which got a mighty boost in the '60s and '70s from hippies and feminists, isn't about to die.

Not even AIDS can kill it. It is part of this century's zeitgeist and will be even more part of the next century's.

That revolution is undergirded by a now unstoppably compelling and cogent new belief system. It says that what people do with their sexuality as consenting adults, as long as they inflict no real injuries on themselves or others, simply is no business of anyone but them — no more so than what books they read or food they eat.

It is a highly practical belief system. In Japan, for instance, where it prevails to a far greater extent than it does here, the rates of sexually-transmitted disease and teen-age pregnancy are far below ours.

That is, in the ways that really count — avoidance of disease and of unwanted pregnancies — Christian sexual repression has been a near total bust when contrasted with the permissive approach of the Japanese and of many other cultures.

A Kenyan acquaintance from the Kikuyu Tribe tells me, for instance, that in tribal villages when he was a boy, teen- agers were permitted sexual play with each other in the evenings in the bushes surrounding the village common.

But if a girl became pregnant as a result, it was a matter of deep shame for her, her boyfriend and their families. Teen-agers found ways to reach orgasm without penetration, and "teen pregnancies were almost unheard of," he said. There was no prohibition of sexual activity, only of irresponsible sexual activity.

None of this is to suggest that sexual restraint may not often have legitimate purposes if undertaken voluntarily. Many married couples, for instance, choose monogamy, which often makes sense, especially if they have children.

And I once made a three-month retreat in a Buddhist community where celibacy, including refraining from masturbation, was urged on retreatants so their energies could be fully devoted to meditative practices aimed at spiritual growth.

That was a legitimate reason for sexual restraint, I believed, and I accepted it unreservedly (well almost).

I masturbated once during the three months, while walking in the woods one day out of sight of other retreatants, and I reported it to the Buddhist teacher to whom I was assigned for instruction.

I felt considerable remorse, not so much for masturbating, per se (though a residue of Christian shame was still present in me) but rather for violating the rules of the retreat.

My teacher told me my guilt was as much a meaningless "mind trip" as the sexual fantasies that led to the masturbation in the first place.

Indeed, he said, guilt helps perpetuate the tendencies of mind that result in the very behavior over which guilt was felt in the first place. Acceptance of oneself, warts and all, is the way to break this vicious circle, and meditation helps to achieve that goal, he said.

I don't want to make broadly invidious comparisons between Christianity and Buddhism. I have deep roots in both, and I recognize that all religions, including Buddhism, have their flaws.

But moralistic attacks by Christian fundamentalists and GOP rightwingers on Elders and on welfare mothers represent a kind of religiously-sanctioned violence which is far from moral, and which actually is a reflection of unresolved psychological and spiritual problems.

Whether the fundamentalists intend it or not, the violence sometimes becomes overt, as in the Brookline killings.

That stands in stark contrast to the gentleness and good sense of my Buddhist teacher.

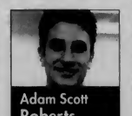
Bureaucratic red tape gets sticky

Recently something very unfortunate has happened to a friend of mine who has been a model resident assistant here at the University of Massachusetts for the last three semesters.



Adam Scott Roberts

She was made aware that her duties as a resident assistant are being a terminated due to an unplanned incident. This university student who also competes as a varsity team member was unable to attend a recent training session for her position as an RA due to a conflict with the team's schedule.

She is attempting to appeal that the team's scheduling was beyond her control, and that they could not practice or train without her during intersession. The team needed her and the housing department needed her as well. She also made the department aware of this conflict well in advance. These steps to remove her from her position as a RA are in fact quite absurd and unfair.

The fact that she is involved in other activities on campus and in various aspects of campus life is remarkable and impressionable.

Unfortunately, her involvement in a varsity level sport conflicted with the planned events of the housing department. If she were a member of a more nationally known athletic team, would she still be stuck in the administrative red tape? Probably not.

The housing department gurus were well aware that she was a student athlete when they hired here three semesters ago. As a veteran RA, she has already had the training which the housing department says she missed this past winter. Numerous times she had demonstrated her ability to do her job efficiently and well. But, because of a technicality she is being fired.

Should the university adopt a policy that no varsity athlete will be allowed to be an RA in the future?

That decision should be formally proposed, discussed and if adopted, published. Perhaps a warning should be placed on the application forms and maybe all varsity athletes should be barred from jobs on campus because their training and games and events take them away from school. If so, this too would require publication and advance notification.

The issue remains this RA has been disciplined for being a student athlete without a policy to this effect in place, without adoption of a rule to this effect, and without prior notice to applicants and to participants in the program.

The housing department needs to see what they are actually doing: creating unprecedented decisions in this matter; being unfair to a dedicated individual and trying to make the student decide between the RA position or the varsity team.

The injustice against this individual is just that, an injustice.

Film's messages need a lesson in subtlety

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

HIGHER LEARNING
Directed by John Singleton with Omar Epps, Michael Rappoport

COURTESY ELI REED

Omar Epps, Ice Cube and Busta Rhymez star in John Singleton's Higher Learning.

Unlearn. The film ends with this word stretched across the American flag that fills the screen. It's an apt metaphor for the problem with John Singleton's painfully obvious new film: When you have to spell things out for your audience (literally and figuratively), there's something wrong with the filmmaker — and the audience.

Higher Learning opens with the same American flag, hinting, not-so subtly, that this is a Message movie, out to confront the bedrock of Singleton's America: racism, homophobia, sexism & the prickly term of diversity. The thing is, Singleton doesn't merely present the issues, he throws them in your face — after watching this movie I yearned for the quiet diplomacy of say, an Oliver Stone film. Singleton's telegraphic direction may make people understand his points more readily, but it also dilutes the film's power; the film is passionate (enough to spare), but it's hardly ever moving.

Singleton's microcosmic setting is the fictional Columbus University (hint, hint), where a cross-section of the freshman class has to deal with just about every social issue head-on. They include track star Malik (Epps), who finds it hard to balance studying and running for his scholarship, but easy to cry racism; Kristen (Kristy Swanson), a naïve California woman who gets raped (...at a frat house) and then questions her sexuality with a women's advocate (Jennifer Connelly); and a maladjusted Renty (Rappaport), who finds the only group he fits in with is...skin-heads.

It's a full plate to be sure, and Singleton seems to want to do justice to it all. However, at the expense of all this rabble-rousing are its characters, all of whom end up as one-issue ciphers. It's a shame, too, because more often than not, the performers are better than their roles.

Omar Epps is credible in a crudely written part; it's not clear if his near-paranoid, knee-jerk reactions to racism are meant as a comment upon the character or merely myopic on Singleton's part. Michael Rappaport's journey from anti-socialite to gun-toting fascist is unbelievable (it's more a plot twist than a message), though his performance is worth watching. And in strong supporting performances, Ice Cube, Connelly and Swanson do better work than their characters allow.

The notable exception to this is Laurence Fishburne, whose role as a noble, know-it-all mentor and political professor is as insufferable as the fortune-cookie dialogue he's forced to spout. Sounding like a cross between James Earl Jones and Alfred Hitchcock, Fishburne gets all the "meaningful" lines that seem leftover from an overly-earnest episode of "The Cosby Show." It's showy, unnecessary grandstanding on the part of both Fishburne and Singleton.

Fishburne's role may be Singleton's biggest conceit, but it's hardly the only one. The director pays lip service to many of the issues that do face college students; yet the choice of the skin-head subplot to take over the film's central focus is problematic on all sides. First of all, are skinheads that much of a problem on campuses to warrant such a chunk of the film's time? Second, is the subplot merely an uneasy projection of racist fear — more based in paranoia than the film's reality? Or is it one of Singleton's many dramatic short cuts designed more to be powerful at face value than honestly challenging?

It's a quality that plagues the film as a message movie. It's clear that Singleton wants to change minds — this is not an idle film — but it is artistically inert. It's a problem whenever the abstract notions of film art (which by evidence of Singleton's always-deliberate camera movements shows he is very interested in), mass-market entertainment and "social value." A film can be entertaining and socially relevant — that's no trick — but it is harder to be artistically valid without selling your soul (and dumbing down your movie).

This is why the little-known 1986 gem Parting Glances will always be a superior AIDS drama than the patronizing Philadelphia and why Menace II Society will always be a sharper depiction of inner-city jeopardy than the "Afterschool Special"-theatrics of Boyz N the Hood (whose "Increase the Peace" message — like "Unlearn" seems more a redundant, spelled-out lesson for those who didn't get it the first time around).

Higher Learning, like Philadelphia, may be a hit with mall audiences primarily because it packages racism as an easy-to-swallow, hip message movie. But that doesn't begin to fully explain why Singleton, as a writer, director and film artist, needs to tone down the messages and start working on his cookie-cutter, schizophrenic plotting (see the dismal Poetic Justice). Only then will the sound and the fury finally signify something — anything. C

A resolution to stop the charade on New Year's

When I was little, if my parents didn't want me to do something that I really wanted to, I would say, "But everyone else is doing it!"

Keeping up with others was a big part of being little for a lot of us. And while I won't go and shove the whole "be yourself" thing down anyone's throats, there always seems to be one night of the year when one feels the most pressure to "go along"...New Year's Eve.

Growing up, we're bombarded with the idea that in order to be cool you have to go out and get blasted on New Year's. Parties, bars, clubs and just finding a place to go and get stupid is what our culture demands of us, and if you don't at least try, there must be something wrong with you.

Mike's Mental Stew

I've never had the best of social lives on New Year's Eve. I had only a few close friends and we weren't in with the party crowd. And even if we had been, my parents would have never gone for it. So for the years in high school that I wasn't at home watching a "Three Stooges" marathon, I was crashing at a friend's house, eating Chinese food and playing pool all night.

Once I got to college, I would say to myself, "My parents aren't going to hold me back any more, I'm gonna do my own thing." My "own thing" mind you, was just what everybody else was doing, except that I was going to do it.

That attitude got me nowhere the first year, and I spent the night alone. But the second year I was a little more lucky, so I went out to a party, which I left at 11:55 and spent the last seconds of 1993 in my car thinking about how it really wasn't my thing.

Enter New Year's Eve 1994 and it was time for a change of pace — first night festivities in good old Providence. And for all the anticipation, the night just reminded me- that hanging out in hot clubs bumping up against sweaty, drunk people is just not my ideal picture of a fun evening.

What is it about New Year's Eve that has caused us to raise it to such a mythical status? We have turned a simple change of date into some sort of test of one's social status.

Getting wasted and sucking face with someone at midnight is something that can be done any night of the year but for some reason if you don't on New Year's Eve you are some sort of social miscreant.

Yes, I counted down to Midnight, let out a scream, and do you know what happened? Nothing. Nothing except millions of people throwing out their old calendars, that is. I was still the same person and couldn't help but yearn for the days when I could just plop myself on the couch and kill brain cells with enormous amounts of TV — at least the Stooges were on the screen and not on the dance floor.

The new book Confusion Is Next chronicles the rise of Sonic Youth.

Band bio strikes all the right chords

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

CONFUSION IS NEXT: THE SONIC YOUTH STORY
Alec Foege
St. Martin's Press

Long before Lollapalooza cast its ominous shadow over the unsuspecting masses, Nirvana became multi-platinum heroes and terms such as "alternative" and "grunge" became household words, there was Sonic Youth.

This often over-looked notion is the underlying theme and backbone throughout Confusion Is Next: The Sonic Youth Story, the first book in what seems to be a sudden movement to re-examine the band's often under-appreciated but amazingly influential career (another book is slated for an upcoming release and the group's label, DGC, is in the process of re-releasing their entire back-catalog).

Written with obvious admiration by Alec Foege, a former senior editor at Spin magazine, Confusion Is Next carefully documents the band's 14-year career, paying equal attention to both their early "art-damaged" days, as well as their flirtation with minor success in the '90s. Of course all this may sound like the usual by-the-numbers band bio, but thankfully it's not. Foege manages to avoid most "rock novel" cliches by drenching Confusion Is Next with a sharp knowledge of the early '80s avant-garde and independent scene, and by keeping any critical gushing to a minimum.

Complete with interviews from Sonic Youth themselves and other friends and artists close to the band, such as noise terrorist/composer Glenn Branca, performance artist Lydia Lunch, ex- fire hose bassist Mike Watt and members of the Beastie Boys and Pavement, Confusion Is Next at times reads less like a chronicle of a rock n' roll group and more like a who's who in alternative music.

By utilizing interviews from people who witnessed the Sonic Youth phenomenon at various phases of the band's career, Foege manages to take the reader on a fascinating ride through the critically lauded — but rarely documented — '80s underground movement.

The only complaint with Confusion Is Next may be the fact that there is simply not enough Sonic Youth.

Although Foege does include extensive commentary from the band themselves, there seems to be something missing.

So much attention is given to the various "scenes" that Sonic Youth sprang from early on in the book that at times it feels as though Foege is just using the band as a catalyst to recount the last decade or so of independent music.

This of course is not necessarily a bad thing. As Foege points out repeatedly in the book, the conservative ideals of the Reagan-era virtually left anything left of center destined to go ignored.

That is why Confusion Is Next is such an interesting, if not important, biography. It not only works as a record of one of music's most instrumental bands (though it is definitely not the "definitive" study) but also as a valuable history lesson of an important musical period that has often gone unnoticed.

Though the band themselves don't offer much insight into their creative endeavors or their place in music world, Confusion Is Next more than justifies their place in rock history, and that seems to be Foege's main goal from the very beginning of the book.

"The personal life and secret side of each member is really not too revealed here. The band comes across as conceptual, forced pretentious, and materialistic, but also friendly, smart, happy, and diligent," writes Thurston Moore, the band's eccentric lead singer and unorthodox guitarist, in the book's Foreword. "...But where's the sadness and soul-searching which, like anyone, we all experience? I can only say it's undercover. And it's in the music..."

Mr. Foege could not have said it any better himself.

Area, international artists to showcase their latest works in two Valley exhibits

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

February may be a short month, but the art world is taking full advantage of the back to school blues by showcasing a slew of artwork at a variety of venues, from formal galleries to public libraries and best of all — they're free.

Hatfield artist Jane Seidlitz can whisk you away to the more beautiful parts of the Pioneer Valley with her exhibit simply entitled "Recent Works." The collection opens today thru the Feb. 28 at the Burnett Gallery in the Jones Library on Amnity Street in Amherst.

The paintings manifest the beauty of the Valley's landscapes in oils and pastels. One piece, "Late Summer," is an oil on canvas that takes in the essence of the days before the leaves turn into their autumn array and leave behind the greenness provided by sultry days and humid nights.

Remarkably, Seidlitz has only been a resident of the area for a year and a half.

"For eight years I lived in Nepal right after college. I moved back in 1990 and mainly lived in New York City and San Francisco," Seidlitz said.

The 35-year-old painter went to Brown University where she studied Indian civilization and sand script in addition to her art courses. During her college years, two were spent in France. She went to Nepal after graduation to study Tibetan Buddhism. This diverse education and life experience also reflects in the various medias Seidlitz has used.

"I've also done works in pencil and ceramics. I apprenticed to a potter when I was in high school," said the artist.

"Recent Works" was entitled such because it is a diverse collection of the artist's works and is an exclusive display of her talent with oil paints and her ability to transpose the awe inspiring freshness of nature onto canvas. Burnett Gallery's hours are Mon. – Sat., 9 a.m. – 5:30 p.m. and Tues. – Thurs. evenings to 9 p.m.

Another exhibit that promises some introspection into life is "Kaisо" at the Hampshire College Film and Photography Gallery. The collection consists of a series of dyed transferred photographs by artist Mihoko Yamagata.

Yamagata was born in Japan and immigrated to the United Sates. After receiving her NEA grant she began a three-year project that tells her grandmother's life story and reflects on her hardships, experiences, loves and place in society. The pictures are also a collection of timeless interviews and a look into a rich life. The Photography Gallery hours are Mon–Fri 9 p.m.–10 p.m.; Sat–Sun 1 p.m.–10 p.m. For more information call 582–5447.

with an upper shelf wristcr at 14:47.

"It was a great pass by Corky Idefenseman Brian Corcoran], but I almost pushed it too far," Jacques said. "When you get a 3–0 lead on the No. 1 team, you think, 'Hey, we can play with these guys.'"

The question entering the second period concerned Maine's ability to play with UMass. The Black Bears rolled over the Minutemen Friday with some unlikely suspects carrying the club. Power forward Brad Mahoney tripled his output with two goals (numbers 2 and 3 of the year) and rarely seen backup goaltender Blair Marsh stopped all eight UMass shots in the third period.

But UMass gained a 4–0 advantage at 3:21 of the middle frame Saturday, only the second time all season it had enjoyed such a wide lead. This one came courtesy of Wagar as well, on a wrap-around shot off a good backhanded pass from Evans and a second assist by Jacques.

Tim Lovell was lucky to ruin Regan's improbable shutout bid at 14:14 as his shot deflected into the cage. Allison and Jamie Thompson picked up assists.

At 2:54 of the third period, Maine slipped away at the deficit on the power play, only two seconds before Tom Perry's high sticking penalty would expire. Jeff Tory slipped a rebound past a sprawled Regan to make it 4–2, with Lovell and Arlington's Dave MacIsaac assisting.

"I felt if we could get one back we'd be fine, but we couldn't do it," Walsh said. "We only played one period of emotional hockey. It's a great win for their program, and I actually internally enjoyed watching them celebrate. It was a benchmark game, but we put ourselves in our predicament."

It was Maine that sped to a 3-0 first period lead Friday on Mahoney's two goals and the first of the game by Hockey East Freshman of the Year frontrunner Scott Parmentier (nine goals, 15 assists, 24 points) of Blackstone.

Regan relieved Kilduff at 11:51 of the second and stopped 18 of 19 shots for a .958 save percentage over the weekend. Regan's season totals stand at 2–7–2, 4.19 goals against average, .883 save percentage.

appointed in 17–point wins," said Massachusetts coach John Calipari after the game.

The Minutemen did not disappoint in defeating the much- improved St. Bonnies, though you could not tell by the quiet, sold-out Mullins Center crowd.

It was a slow first half for Massachusetts. The shooting from the field was fair (10–25), and they out–rebounded the Bonnies 26–16, but the Minutemen turned over the ball 12 times. Of course, when the visitor had a chance to score, they could not convert, shooting a paltry 27 percent from the field.

HOW ARE YOU DOING ON YOUR NEW YEARS RESOLUTIONS?
I DIDN'T MAKE ANY.
SEE, IN ORDER TO IMPROVE ONESELF, ONE MUST HAVE SOME IDEA OF WHAT'S GOOD. THAT IMPLIES CERTAIN VALUES.
BUT AS WE ALL KNOW, VALUES ARE RELATIVE. EVERY SYSTEM OF BELIEF IS EQUALLY VALID AND WE NEED TO TOLERATE DIVERSITY. VIRTUE ISN'T "BETTER" THAN VICE. IT'S JUST DIFFERENT.
I DON'T KNOW IF I CAN TOLERATE THAT MUCH TOLERANCE.
I REFUSE TO BE VICTIMIZED BY NOTIONS OF VIRTUOUS BEHAVIOR.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Your finance affairs could be a bit complicated now. Clear up a misunderstanding with family and friends before bucking down to work today. Turning your back on negative people will save valuable time.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): You can expect plenty of action on the business front today. Extra cash may become available via legal action. Focus on self improvement activities. Your will power wins you new respect from your peers.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Those involved in sales or public relations should have a red letter day. Your dynamic personality will not be lost on influential people. Pay more attention to your psychic impressions. Your instincts are superb.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): A recent disappointment could be interfering with your efforts to think positively. Extravagant spending is no way to console yourself. Reach out to others in the same boat. An optimistic spirit can work miracles.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Profits are about to rise. Guard against becoming over-confident. Do not allow an intriguing proposition to cloud your thinking. Sports or yoga can help you handle stress.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Steer clear of emotional scenes. Visiting good friends or working out will help relieve tension. Everyone has their share of faults. Correct your own bad habits before criticizing other family members.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Go on a shrift luck! Practice small economies such as brown-bagging your lunch. Career progress comes faster when you emphasize long-term aims. If you feel your authority slipping at work, crack the whip.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Someone may imply that your romantic overtures lack finesse. Let the other party make the first move! Using your credit cards too often will leave you with sizable bills. Polish your writing & speaking skills.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): A new venture gets off to a flying start. Your enthusiasm is contagious. Subordinates will admire your get-up-and-go attitude. Romance looks rosy as long as you do not make too many demands.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): A pet project comes to fruition this week. Give yourself a pat on the back — you deserve it. Your mood can control outcomes more and more as the day progresses. Use your authority wisely.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Seek opportunity to meet people who can assist your career or business. A friend of a friend may agree to pull some strings on your behalf. Timely letters and phone calls will boost your popularity.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Stop taking minor setbacks so seriously. Frustration and tension could lead to a health upset. Remain calm and take things as they come. Crowds are not your cup of tea.

Minuteman teams defeat No. 1, remain No. 1

Regan makes season–high 51 saves; hockey pulls upset of year over Maine

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

"1" is a number that has many meanings in University of Massachusetts sports. It is the rank of the men's basketball team, which knocked off No. 1 two seasons running, and the field hockey team beat No. 1 last fall.

In December the UMass hockey team held the dubious distinction of having the lowest possible ranking among the nation's 44 Division I teams, but its stunning 4–2 defeat of No. 1 Maine Saturday, Maine's first Hockey East loss and second overall, proved UMass has grown far better in a month.

"I feel this is the biggest upset of the year in college hockey, and our kids deserve it," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "Some guys were at the psychological brink."

Blair Wagar paced the Minutemen (5–17–2, 3–11 in HE) with two goals and Brian Regan made a career and UMass season–high 51 saves, including 25 in the third period.

"We might be even higher than walking on air," Regan said. "The biggest difference between tonight and last night [Maine beat UMass 7–2 Friday] was we capitalized on our opportunities and stopped theirs."

Mallen said he thought Regan was "the best goalie in North America" when he recruited him, and Regan was named Hockey East Rookie of the Week.

"This was no fluke," Maine Coach Shawn Walsh said of Regan's display. "He came in last night and gave up only one goal in half a game. I told him I thought he was really good."

Mike Evans kicked off an unanswered three–goal spree at 6:09 of the first period. Chris Fawcett centered a pass from the right face–off circle that Evans one–timed past Blair Allison.

Maine (22–2–6, 10–1–6) incurred a foolish too many men on the ice infraction at 7:39, and Wagar got his fifth of the year at 7:52. UMass' 12th power play goal in its 137th chance. Wagar scooped a rebound in with Rob Bonneau and Sal Manganaro earning assists.

"It seems like I've been getting chances but not capitalizing, so it was about time I scored," Wagar said.

Jon Jacques made it 3–0 when he finished a breakaway

Massachusetts wins three in week, retains top spot in college basketball

By Andrew Bryce

When the No. 1 team wins three games over the course of a week, it is safe to say that they will retain the top spot.

Well, that other New England team everyone is talking about over in Storrs, CT, also helped matters for the top– ranked University of Massachusetts men's hoop team as then No. 2 Connecticut took a beating at the hands of Kansas, 88–59.

With the 103–53 drubbing of Duquesne on Jan. 24, and the last two wins against West Virginia and St. Bonaventure, the Minutemen increased their record to 16–1 (8–0 in the Atlantic 10).

Here's a look at the last two games.

Massachusetts 97, West Virginia 94

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — This game proved just how dangerous the Minutemen can be.

Wait a minute. A three–point win in overtime? Against West Virginia, an 8–7 team and sub–.500 team heading into the Jan. 27 contest?

Yes.

What is not seen in the final score is how Massachusetts was down 18 with 4:47 to play, and how Mike Williams buried a trey with 16.5 seconds in the OT session to win it for the Minutemen. What is not seen is how for the first 35– plus minutes, West Virginia took advantage of its opportunities against the sluggish and obviously fatigued Minutemen.

Massachusetts went on 24–6 run after the Mountaineer lead reached 18, and tied it up at 86 to force it into overtime after two Williams free throws and a Dana Dingle tip–in.

WORCESTER — Over intercession, winning was not a problem for the University of Massachusetts hockey team as they compiled a 5–3–1 record, including a victory against top–ranked Maine.

Consistency has been a problem, though, as the Minutemen have yet to win consecutive games this year.

At the Hart Center in Worcester, Massachusetts fell to Holy Cross last night in a 3–2 overtime affair before a delighted crowd of 843 in attendance.

Holy Cross	3
Massachusetts	2

Despite outshooting the Crusaders 42–21, the Minutemen could not capitalize on some late opportunities and watched their record slip to 5–18–2.

"I just thought that some guys took this game too lightly after the win the other night," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said.

"I think a lot of our guys were looking past this game."

With No. 4 Boston University and No. 7 New Hampshire coming to the William D. Mullins Center this weekend, the Minutemen have much to be anxious about.

However, the Minutemen came out hard early, dominating the first period. Massachusetts outshot the Crusaders by an 18–1 margin, and notched the game's first goal.

At the 3:28 mark, Warren Norris broke down the right wing, after collecting a Jon Jaques pass and beat Crusader net–minder Kevin Broderick to the five hole for a 1–0 Massachusetts lead.

After a stagnant first period, Holy Cross played a solid second, tying the contest at one 3:34 into the period. Keith Moran eluded defenseman Brian Corcoran and beat goal–tender Dave Kilduff, on the power play to even the score.

"We made an adjustment to there speed level and what they were doing," Holy Cross Paul Pearl said.

"They play a more physical style than we do, but after a while, we just got more comfortable on the ice with them."

Corcoran put the Minutemen ahead 6:49 into the second, scoring his first goal of the year on a 55–foot slapshot that beat Broderick upstairs on the glove side.

The two sides played evenly for the following 30 minutes until the Crusaders knotted the game with 53 seconds remaining as Jon Callanan put one past Killduff from five feet out.

In the overtime session. Crusader senior captain Jim Jensen fired the game– winning goal through Killduff's legs on the backhand to capture the victory.

Williams hits game–winning basket — again

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

• Again.

It is repetitive, and it is getting pretty old. The cliches that are chimed after Mike Williams hits a game–winning shot are worn out. The nicknames are getting stale, and the descriptions of what goes on in the senior guard's mind in the waning moments of a game are all used up.

So what can you say about Williams' big shot...er...shots at the end of the miraculous 97–94 Minutemen win over West Virginia if you are looking to avoid all the overused material on Mike Williams?

Well, you can say it all again. And don't be surprised if you find yourself saying it again this season.

For the sixth time in his career, Mr. Clutch (there's a nickname) buried a trey with 16.5 seconds left in overtime to culminate the Minutemen's amazing comeback. There must be ice running through his veins when the game is on the line (a cliche), because the question is not when he has hit a game–winner, but whether he has ever missed one.

During the game, Williams shot 6–13, far from spectacular. And his six turnovers weren't so good either. But, again, the game was on the line. And, again, Mike Williams won one for the Minutemen.

So what does go on in his mind come crunch time? We'll save that just in case it happens yet again.

UMass Minuteman Notes

• The West Virginia game had a great college basketball atmosphere. It all started with the blue and yellow carpet being rolled out from the corner of the court and the Mountaineer's gun going off.

The music was blaring, and a cheerleader doing somersaults led the announcing of the West Virginia starters. A bit different from the way Massachusetts does it here at the Mullins Center.

Speaking of Massachusetts, before it came to Morgantown to take on the Mountaineers, the Coliseum crowd was averaging between 5,000–6,000 fans a game.

For the Massachusetts–West Virginia contest, 13,820 were in attendance, the tenth largest crowd in Coliseum history.

Goes to show what happens when the No. 1 team in the country comes to town.

• The road trip took its toll on the entire Massachusetts unit. They arrived in Pittsburgh on Monday, and played Duquesne two days later om Jan. 24. They then stayed in Pittsburgh until the West Virginia game on Jan. 26, made the stroll down West Virginia, went back to Pittsburgh, and came back to Amherst on Saturday morning.

Just talking to Lou Roe after the frenzied West Virginia game and watching him wince several times because of soreness showed the rigors of a road stretch and the fatigue factor. Yet, it was not so bad as to put one in the loss column.

• The St. Bonaventure game on Monday increased three winning streaks for Massachusetts.

The 79–62 victory upped the nation's longest home winning streak to 40 straight on–campus wins (26 straight in the Mullins Center, and also continued their NCAA–leading winning streak, winning their 15th consecutive game.

The 15th straight win also broke the Massachusetts record for consecutive wins. The team's record that it broke? The 1991–92 team won 14 in a row during their Sweet 16 season.

• Lou Roe and Marcus Camby were named as finalists for the 1995 RCA College Basketball Player of the Year award.

Massachusetts and North Carolina (Rasheed Wallace and Jerry Stackhouse) are the only two schools to have two players named to the list of 13 finalists.

Minutewomen surprising all, winning 11 of last 12 games

By Candice Flemming

Massachusetts 73, Duquesne 47

Melissa Gurile scored 19 points, including the 1,000 of her career, and three other players scored in double figures to lead the Minutewomen in their win over the Lady Dukes at the Curry Hicks Cage on Jan. 28.

Gurile scored her 1,000 point on a free throw with 4:16 left in the game. She is only the eighth player in Massachusetts history to score 1,000 points in a career. Gurile joins Octavia Thomas, who scored her 1,000 point vs. Brown on Jan. 17.

The Minutewomen jumped out to a 18–6 lead on a Thomas layup with 12:56 left in the first half and never let the lead fall below eight points for the rest of the game.

Massachusetts increased the lead to 15 twice in the last three minutes of the half on Gurile jumpers.

Crystal Carroll helped the Minutewomen keep the pressure on the Lady Dukes in the second half scoring nine of Massachusetts' first 16 points, including seven in a row. The lead increased to 62–41 on a Gurile field goal with 6:55 left and it reached 28 points (73–45) on a Beth Kuzmeski jumper with 34 seconds left.

A huge reason why the Minutewomen were able to come away with the win was their effectiveness at shutting down the Lady Dukes' point guard, Korie Hlede. The 5–foot–9 freshman sensation was held to her lowest point total and rebound total of the season with 15 and 3 respectively. Coming into the game, Hlede was leading the Atlantic 10 in scoring with 24.9 points per game and was tied for second in rebounding with 8.6.

"[Hlede] is one of the best players anybody's going to see. That kid can play," Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Obviously, our focus was trying to contain her and I think we did a fairly good job. I think she only got maybe two or three clean looks at the bucket."

Hlede was only 6–20 from the field, 1–4 from the three– point arc and committed seven turnovers.

Tricia Hopson and Sabriya Mitchell both provided quality minutes at the point guard position for the Minutewomen.

"Every time those two (Hopson and Mitchell) go out there they're starting to play much more controlled," O'Brien said. "They're starting to really understand the offenses and I really think that's made us better. They are a nice, controlled tandem at point guard."

Carroll finished with 17 points (7–7 from the free throw line), seven rebounds and a game–high six assists while Thomas (four steals) and Kuzmeski finished with 12 each. Gurile had a game–high eight rebounds.

Massachusetts 80, St. Bonaventure 69

Gurile once again was the leading scorer for the Minutewomen in their win over the Bonnies at St. Bonaventure on Jan. 30. Gurile scored a season–high 24 points to go along with six rebounds.

UMass shot poorly (.265 percentage) in the first half while the Bonnies shot .455. St. Bonaventure held a nine–point lead at 25–16 until UMass cut the lead to one, 29–28, at the half.

With 9:40 left in the game, the Bonnies held a 53–52 lead, but the Minutewomen stormed back and went on a 14–2 run over the next five minutes, led by Thomas' eight points, and took a 66–55 lead with 4:47 left. UMass was in control from there and went on to record the victory.

Carroll continued her great play of late, scoring 20 points, including 10–13 from the line, while Thomas finished with her fourth double–double of the season (15 points, a game– high 14 rebounds). The rebound total also tied a career–high.

With the two wins, the Minutewomen improved to 11–6 overall, 6–1 in the A–10. They have won 11 of their last 12, including their last five.

Hooker announces plan in response to Weld's budget cuts

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker announced an action plan yesterday to guide the UMass system through continuing economic difficulties.

Following close on the heels of Gov. William F. Weld's proposed $10 million cut for higher education, the plan highlights investment in technology, an early retirement program, increased fundraising and efforts to improve relations between the University and the state government.

Working with the UMass Board of Trustees, Hooker designed a seven–point plan titled "Moving Toward the 21st Century." Hooker said the plan comes after two years of observation of the University.

With Gov. William F. Weld's proposed $10 million budget cut for higher education, the board concluded universities are facing an economic challenge that can be dealt with by reducing costs and increasing resources.

Vice Chancellor Ronald Story said that if Weld's proposal is passed by the Massachusetts legislature, the University would be devastated.

"[Weld's cut] would have about an $8 million effect on the University," Story said.

According to Story, the $8 million figure comes from not just the $10 million cut but also a tuition retention plan that ties into Weld's budget proposal.

The tuition retention plan would take away from currently state–supported fringe benefits like health care for University employees. With tuition retention, the fringe benefit costs would be the Universities' responsibility, Story said.

He said the budget will most likely be revised as it goes through the legislature.

"We do better in the legislative [branch] than the executive, but we're still starting in a hole," Story said.

In response to what the Board of Trustees called "difficult fiscal realities in the commonwealth" for UMass, Hooker said he plans to redesign administrative functions for the University to decrease costs and improve services.

According to notes from the board meeting, the plan will call for an investment in technology and implementation of an early retirement program and retraining for displaced employees.

The second part of the action plan calls for ranking University activities to identify high–priority programs for investment.

Story said he does not think budget cuts will mean an increase in students' tuition.

"We have gone down that road as far as we can go," Story said. "[UMass] is a pretty expensive place."

To increase funds for the University, Hooker is calling for improved fund–raising by hiring a recruit for executive director of the UMass Foundation and making loans available for the campus.

Several steps in Hooker's plan would improve technology and facilities at the University requiring $200 million in funding.

The meeting notes said, however, that a $25 million Technology Bond Bill would be available for increasing the technological status of the campus.

The final step in the plan would create a new "compact" with the state. The action would require a new agreement from both the executive and legislative branches of the state to stabilize an operating budget and salary package.

The notes from the meeting require that the state house become more aware of the needs of the University.

According to Hooker, the action plan would be completely effective by the year 2000.

Prof's book celebrates Amherst girls' basketball

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The memory of the 1992–93 Amherst Regional High School girls basketball team's championship season is still fresh in the minds of many, and the team has University of Massachusetts journalism professor Madeleine Blais to thank for it.

Unlike most title–winning teams whose memory fades the next year, the Hurricanes' season was immortalized in Blais' book, In These Girls Hope is a Muscle. The book follows the team through its championship season and talks about girls' and women's athletics in general. Blais believes the book is helping to alert people to the importance of females in sports.

"For years it's been understood that men have excess energy and that competing in sports builds character for them," Blais said. "People are starting to understand that girls have that energy as well and that competing builds character for them too."

Since its publication, the book has gained considerable publicity for Blais and the team. The book has been reviewed by several media outlets around the nation and, according to Blais, has received positive reviews.

ABC's "Good Morning America" did an interview yesterday with Blais, Jen Parriceau and Rita Powell, who were both members of the team.

"[The publicity] is really fun," Blais said. "I didn't expect this."

House pushes toward opposing state mandates

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Republicans took a big step forward on their "Contract With America" agenda Wednesday, pushing through a bill restricting the federal government's ability to impose unfunded mandates on the states.

Negotiations to settle minor differences between the House and Senate versions of the measure and final votes in both chambers were the lone remaining obstacles to getting the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act to President Clinton's desk.

The bill, which would require that Congress pay for many programs it imposes on states and local governments, was approved 360-74 after eight days of often contentious debate on the House floor. There was applause on the floor when the vote was announced.

All 230 Republicans in the House voted for the bill, along with 130 Democrats. Voting against it were 73 Democrats and the chamber's sole independent, Rep. Bernard Sanders of Vermont.

Rep. William Clinger, R-Pa., the manager of the bill, said it would begin historic changes in the way the federal government does business. "This bill will restore state and local governments to their true places as partners in our federal system."

While supporters of unfunded mandates were hailing its passage, backers of the balanced-budget amendment to the Constitution were arguing for that measure during a third day of debate on the Senate floor.

At the same time, a Senate Judiciary subcommittee became the first panel to approve a proposed Constitutional amendment to impose term limits on members of Congress. On a party-line vote of 5-3, the GOP-controlled panel approved a measure to bar senators from serving more than two full terms, and House members from serving more than six. That would allow 12 years of service in each chamber.

And the House Judiciary Committee advanced Republican efforts to rewrite last year's anti-crime law, approving a measure that would spend $10.5 billion on prison construction, $2.5 billion more than in the 1994 law, but limit funding to states that are cracking down on violent criminals.

Information superhighway open to students

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts who are interested in cruising the information superhighway can choose from commercial services to the campus' own University of Massachusetts' Office of Information Technology (OIT).

For students on a budget, the University account — at $20 a semester for students — is a wise choice.

The University accounts offer complete Internet access including unlimited time, according to Duncan Chesley, director of computing administration at OIT.

The Internet allows students to send e–mail across the globe and gives them access to large databases from across the nation.

University accounts also offer students limited access to the World Wide Web.

The Web is an agreement to share hypertext, a data format designed to convey movies, sounds and still pictures, Chesley said.

According to Chesley, the Web, currently text–based at UMass, allows users access to large amounts of information at the click of a button.

"OIT is about to announce a preferred path to get [World Wide Web] access to our clients," he said. "But the time scale and cost implications are still being studied."

Students have access to the University network from terminals in the W.E.B. Dubois Tower Library and the Lederle Graduate Research Center, as well as from rooms in the living areas, Chesley said.

Students interested in complete Web connections and other perks like on–line libraries and shopping can find them in one of the many available commercial services.

Total Internet access with Delphi

Delphi is the only large commercial service that offers complete Internet access, said Delphi spokesperson Gwenn Gauthier.

According to Gauthier, Delphi offers on–line shopping, games and publications, as well as net access.

She said one of Delphi's strong selling points is its on–line games. The games include role playing, strategy and an acclaimed flight simulator that has been used by flight training programs.

"Another big selling point is its relation with Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation, which includes Twentieth Century Fox and Fox," Gauthier said.

Delphi costs $20 per month and limits users to a free 20 hours a month; there is a charge for additional time. Students interested in Delphi can call 800–695–4005.

Prodigy has complete Web access

Prodigy is the only commercial service that offers users complete World Wide Web access but it has limited Internet access, said Prodigy Communications Manager Mike Darcy.

According to Darcy, Prodigy gives users access to most Internet services like e–mail and newsgroups.

"Telnet is the only Internet service lacking [in Prodigy]," Darcy said.

According to Chesley, Telnet allows users to access remote computers.

Darcy said Prodigy offers on–line shopping and publications like most other commercial services.

Prodigy also offers users the ability to download e–mail and other text files so the user does not have to waste time tying up the phone line, he said.

Prodigy costs $9.95 per month and users are limited to five free hours with additional charges for extra time.

Diversity programs eligible for awards

By Hernán Rozemberg and Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Promoting mutual respect and multicultural issues are two of the goals for the Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations.

The Commission will award funding of between $500 to $1,000 to undergraduates, graduate students, staff or faculty who have proposed an activity or program which meet the required goals, said Grant Ingle, director of the Office of Human Relations.

"The activity must encourage collaboration between different campus communities and constituencies, enhance understanding of multicultural and social justice issues, and promote mutual respect on campus or in the larger community," Ingle said.

According to the commission's request for proposals, another essential requirement is that recognition and respect of all involved is maintained and clearly conveyed in the activity.

In addition, the commission requested projects bring a new perspective in dealing with multicultural issues and not merely continue an old program or project.

Various activities include such events as seminars, speakers, community public service programs and cooperative faculty/student efforts to develop new courses.

For example, someone may want to bring together African–American and Jewish students for a dialogue, Ingle said.

"We want to bring different groups together to explore issues," Ingle said. "The awards are an incentive for people to take action in diversity issues."

This is the third year the awards are being offered, and according to Ingle, programs and activities have been successful in the past.

"Last year we sponsored a multicultural film festival, which included visits from an African and a Puerto Rican filmmaker," Ingle said. "Anti–racism programs were held, and there was an international fair to promote international and American student relations."

The commission was the first group to offer awards like these and this is the third year proposals have been accepted, Ingle said. Other organizations have followed suit by awarding projects with funding.

"The idea of awards like these has been around for a few years," Ingle said. "Our student response was that we needed to help bring people together on campus in the community."

Such funding makes sense because it promotes interaction between students, faculty and different groups, Ingle said.

Proposals will be reviewed by a committee and a sub–committee from the commission and the Chancellor's Multicultural Advisory Board, said Joyce Berkman of the chancellor's committee.

"The committees will look for proposals which create a community of mutual understanding," Berkman said.

All proposals are due by March 3 and awards will be announced on March 27.

For more information on the proposals, contact the Office of Human Relations at 545–0851.

Pariseau, a co-captain on the team, has benefitted considerably from the publicity the team has received. The former Amherst star and current Dartmouth sophomore guard wrote a column on being a female athlete in an issue of Seventeen magazine and will intern with the Miami Heat of the National Basketball Association. This comes as a direct result of the book's publicity.

The Amherst community has embraced the book as well. Amherst Coach Ron Moyer, Blais and 12 of the 15 members of the team held a book signing Jan. 21 at the Amherst High School Gymnasium. Over 200 people came to relive the memories and meet the author. Moyer was pleased to be a part of the process.

"The recording with the emotion and the feeling is really what I'll treasure the most," Moyer said. "Looking back and remembering the relationships I had with these kids is really satisfying. Not many coaches or teachers get that kind of feedback."

The book originated from an unlikely source. Blais' babysitter, Kristen Marvin, was the starting center for the squad. Blais accepted Marvin's invitation to attend a game and got so caught up in its enthusiasm she decided to write about them.

"It's funny," Blais said. "One babysitter and look at the hoopla that it has created."

Blais originally featured the team in a cover story in the New York Times Magazine. The article received positive feedback and Blais decided to expand the article into a book.

The book is currently in its third printing and is continuing to gain interest.

*Deferred Apple Computer Loan offer expires February 17, 1995. No payment of interest or principal will be required for 90 days. (Some resellers may require a deposit to hold merchandise while loan is being approved.) Interest accruing during this 90-day period will be added to principal, and the principal amount, as to increased, will thereafter bear interest which will be included in the repayment schedule.
*Monthly payment is an estimate based on a purchase price of $1,931.52, which includes 8.5% sales tax, for the Macintosh Performa 636CD system shown above. Including loan fee, the total loan amount is $2,044.00, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $33.50. The monthly payment above was calculated using an estimate of sales tax in San Francisco. If the applicable sales tax is 8.75% (Chicago) or 70% (Philadelphia), the monthly payment would be $33.58 or $33.04, respectively. Computer system prices, loan amounts, and sales taxes may vary. See your authorized Apple Campus Reseller or representative for current system prices. loans are in amounts of $1,000 to a maximum of $10,000. You may take out more than one loan, but the total of all loans cannot exceed $10,000 annually. A 5.5% loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount. The interest rate is variable, based on the commercial paper rate plus 5.35%. For the month of November, 1994, the interest rate was 10.85% and the Annual Percentage Rate was 12.64%. 8-year loan term with no prepayment penalty. The monthly payment and the annual percentage rate shown assumes the 90-day deferment of principal and interest described above and no other deferment of principal or interest. Students may defer principal payments up to 4 years, or until graduation. Deferment will change your monthly payments. The Apple Computer Loan is subject to credit approval. Apple Computer Loan and 90-Day Deferred Payment Plan offers available only to qualifying students, faculty and staff. New advisor, vice president named at Hillel

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

As the new semester begins, there is a host of new faces at the University of Massachusetts Hillel.

Two Hillel officer positions were vacated last semester, and faculty advisor Delphine Quarles left for a new administrative position.

UMass junior Marc Assa replaces Ron Gonen as vice president. Gonen is taking a semester abroad in Spain. Elected officers usually serve for a full year after elections, which are held around the beginning of May.

Assa has been active for three years in Hillel and represented UMass Hillel at the 1994 Spitzer Forum in Philadelphia.

Assa said a number of programs are already planned for this semester and that he hopes to broaden his reach to the Jewish population on campus. "I want to try to build bridges to other minority groups on campus," he said.

The other officer who left was Treasurer Lynne Wolfson. She left because she is making "Aliyah," or moving permanently to Israel. The treasurer position has not yet been filled.

Wolfson said she chose to move now because "the timing is right."

"It's something I've wanted to do since I was 14, and I need to follow my heart and head," she said. "I don't mean to leave Hillel like this. I feel a great sense of responsibility towards Hillel, and I love Hillel."

Of her accomplishments at the Jewish organization Wolfson said, "I've learned a lot in Hillel and I hope I've given to others. I'm going to miss my friends very much."

Besides her duties as treasurer, Wolfson co-chaired the Student Alliance of Israel with Assa, who will step down from this position to commit his full energy to his new duties.

Wolfson and Assa will be replaced by new co-chairs Zeesie Pertain and Rachel Krausner.

Sophomore Pertain said she wants "to bring more Israeli cultural events and to get more Israelis involved in Hillel, not just on the nights we have falafel but really involved."

Quarles has been promoted to director for the Center for Organization, Advising and Programming of campus activities. She had been Hillel's advisor since September 1992.

Quarles said what she remembered most fondly about the job was "the opportunity to work with some absolutely wonderful people on a multitude of events."

"The two I specifically wish to speak about are the collaborations between the Black Mass Communications Project and Hillel with such events as Dr. Laz and the Cure, and also the multicultural Seder, and the lecture with professor John Bracey and Professor James Young on the Black and Jewish experience," she said.

Replacing Quarles will be Judy Gagnon, who could not be reached for comment.

There will be an all staff meeting Tuesday, Feb. 7 at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center basement. All Collegian staff are required to attend.

We will be discussing plans for the semester, amendments to the Constitution, a new styleguide and many more exciting things. Don't miss it!

WOMEN making WAVES

Compiled by Colleen D. Shanahan

Virtual parenthood

"Baby Think it Over" weighs seven pounds and screams and cries randomly throughout the day and night. The doll is designed to give teenagers a realistic view of parenthood and hopefully quell the rising rate of teen pregnancy.

To make the doll stop crying, a key must be inserted into its back for anywhere from five to 35 minutes. This number was derived from the approximate time it would take to care for or feed a newborn. Says one California teen who spent only three days with the doll, "You definitely don't want that baby."

Drunken stupor

Legal scholars and women's rights advocates are now leery of accused rapists using drunkenness as a defense.

A recent Canadian Supreme Court ruling may establish extreme drunkenness as a successful defense in rape and other sexual abuse cases. An Alberta man successfully argued he could not be held accountable for his actions because he was drunk and was not in control of his faculties.

Emily Paradis of the Concordia University Women's Center in Montreal said the Supreme Court ruling "opens up the appeal process for every rapist and assaulter of women in the country, as the vast majority of assaults are committed under the influence of alcohol."

Paradis went on to say, "It's outrageous that you can be found guilty if you get behind the wheel of a car but not if you assault a woman."

Paid killer

Denver prostitute Avis Young has been accused a second time of breaking a state law written specifically to stop her from spreading the AIDS virus.

Young has been arrested over 30 times on prostitution charges and was recently arrested for propositioning an undercover police officer.

The 34-year-old was released from a women's prison only one month ago. She was sentenced to a 2 -year term in 1992 for violating a 1990 law designed with her in mind. The law made prostitution a felony for anyone who is knowingly infected with HIV.

Denver is also considering requiring anyone charged with prostitution or engaging in sex with a prostitute be tested for sexually transmitted diseases. A stiffer fine for soliciting a prostitute would also be charged.

Notes from the Basement

Wow. It seems that Gov. William F. Weld just does not appreciate the contributions our University and our professors have brought to this Commonwealth. What was that quote? "Underworked and overpaid." Yes, that was it.

Honestly, I have no interest in defending professors who claim "community service" as part of their job description. The last time I checked, community service was something you did as a volunteer thing to help out the community, but maybe I'm just naive.

Then again, I have no interest in defending the governor or his minions, who are also "underworked and overpaid." Weld's Secretary of Finance Charles D. Baker receives the official Pot Calling the Kettle Black Award of the year. Who wants to place bets that he had help penning the letter fired off to the faculty union?

Tracy Monahan

Then again, our own President Michael K. Hooker didn't exactly help the cause by levelling a C+ grade on the University. What was the grading curve? Besides, you wouldn't get a grade like that at this University anyway. It would be more like a BC. C'mon Mike, get it straight.

Bet he is kicking himself for that mishap right about now. Maybe if he'd given out a nice B or even — now, this might be a little grade inflation but bear with me — an AB, the professors would have gotten the cash they hoped for.

Maybe Mike should have followed the recent trend of numerous students and asked for an "incomplete," which would have given the University a couple extra semesters to catch up. Better luck next time.

Lunch at the T.O.C. restaurant has definitely getting better. It's no longer glorified D.C. food, which is a definite plus, but it has its downside. I went to dine recently and was told by the student manager that we would receive a $3 meal subsidy.

"A subsidy?" I asked.

"Yes, $3 off," she replied.

What she didn't say was that you only receive the $3 off if you are on the meal plan. That seems kind of silly, considering that most students on the meal plan are entitled, and go, to lunch at the dining commons.

Next time, I'll just go to the Coffee Shop. The only time they break my heart is when the fries are soggy.

Actually, the T.O.C. has a nifty new feature. The lunch menu offers a "Light Lunch." What it boils down to is this: you can hang out in the lounge and purchase soup and salad from this little salad bar contraption. There were no broken promises of $3 off, either.

What is all this nonsense about a raid by the University of Connecticut marching band? Those wacky band members allegedly stormed the area slapping UConn marching band bumper-stickers on every surface they could find.

I want to know when the counter-raid by the power and class of UMass will happen. It's probably a little cruel to rush down to Storrs, especially so soon after their crushing defeat this past weekend, but after all they started it. Is UMass just going to have to prove we're number one in everything from basketball to marching band to student newspapers?

Who's the number one team in the nation? Yeah, I thought so.

While we're on the topic of UChoke, I mean UConn, where do you get one of those "Refuse to Play" T-shirts? Just for anyone who has no idea what I am talking about, there is a new UMass T-shirt in circulation (or maybe it isn't). It goes something like this: the front reads "UMass Refuse to Lose" and the back says "UConn Refuse to Play." Or something like that.

Mike Ratte, the interviewer on "The John Calipari Show," has one, why don't I? When Ratte brought the shirt out Coach Cal didn't seem too happy. Apparently it's not very sportsmanlike and the Cal-meister doesn't want to thumb his nose at the competition.

Someone with the knowledge (or a T-shirt) has got to come down and visit me.

One more thing about it and then I'll lay off. Why is it that Rafters was the only bar in the area televising the game? People were offering to sell their mothers to get in last Friday night.

The cable system in this area has got to get with the program and start providing ESPN2. Listening to the game on the radio and then catching the highlights just wasn't the same. Will somebody do something about that for me? Thanks.

Media portrayal isn't always objective

Who is this monster named James Cyr Jr.? What right did he have to commit such an atrocity? Is he just plain crazy or did he just suddenly lose his senses? Should there be any doubt as to whether he should spend the rest of his life in jail?

All over journalistic guidelines or recommended codes of ethics in journalism truth and objectivity are stressed as the ultimate and most important objectives. The Codes of Ethics of the Society of Professional Journalists "believes the duty of journalists is to serve the truth. . . [it also believes] the agencies of mass communication are carriers of public discussion and information, acting on their Constitutional mandate and freedom to learn and report the facts."

Hernan Rozemberg

A similar code adopted by the Associated Press Managing Editors adds that "a good newspaper is fair, accurate, honest, responsible, independent and decent. Truth is its guiding principle."

However, it should be noted that it is just as important — although it's often overlooked — to be fair and impartial and to give all sides of the issue. The aforementioned Society reminds reporters that if the public feels the media is not being fair or practicing impartiality, the media can and should be questioned: "Journalists should be accountable to the public for their reports and the public should be encouraged to voice its grievances against the media. Open dialogue with our readers, viewers and listeners should be fostered."

Has this rule of fairness, this practice of neutrality, been upheld concerning Cyr? The Society's guidelines indicate that "the news must guard against invading a person's right to privacy" and "the news media should not pander to morbid curiosity about details of vice and crime."

It is my belief, in all fairness, that these guidelines have been broken time and time again. What has the news media turned into today? This is becoming a more frequently posed question nowadays, but my purpose is to relate it specifically to the case of James Cyr Jr.

If one recalls the time when the actual event took place, the story immediately broke about the horrible, disgusting, atrocious murder by an oppressive, violent, lunatic individual who apparently was not even human — how could he be, after committing such a crime?

The majority — if not all — of the news articles depicted such a picture of Cyr. What ever happened to "innocent until proven guilty?" Perhaps this needs to be seriously taken into consideration, for it seems that Cyr was guilty before proven innocent. Did he ever have a chance to even shed some light on his possible innocence?

As I see it, Cyr had been arrested, indicted and convicted by a vast majority of a public that did not even care about his side of the story. And here, more critically than ever, enters the role of the media. Did in fact the media represent all sides of the issue? Did the media treat Cyr and Tara Hartnett with the same fairness in its reports?

Now the situation is more clear than ever for the media. Cyr was found guilty and thus they were right from the very beginning about him. He had murdered her that day in March, it was quite evident, and that has been officially ratified by the legal system. In a very recent article, Cyr was once again brought back as the murderous monster he was always suspected to be, only now he is finally being punished for it.

"It took long enough," most people probably thought after reading this article. Did anyone consider the fact that Hartnett's parents and a past housemate were reached for comments, no such effort was made to contact Cyr's parents or friends?

Cyr represents nothing more than the violation of several journalistic principles that help feed the bloodthirsty masses — the public wants to see blood and violence, and since it is the media's role to inform the public, it gives it blood and violence. However, there has always has to be a "good" and "evil" in this Manichean society that renowned psychiatrist Frantz Fanon described so well.

Without anyone thinking twice, without much of a doubt, James Cyr Jr. was made out to be guilty, and consequently, guilty he was found. The judge presiding over the case told the jury several times to not pay attention to any news concerning the case, to avoid any outside influence. Now the question must be posed: what would it have been like had we all not paid attention to the media to begin with?

Ah, the places that you'll go

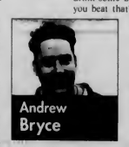
Ah, the places I go to in my town.

It's a small town in southeastern Massachusetts, and we are about an arm hair away from li'l Rhode Island. It's a town that prides itself on having a speedway. Not just your regular speedway, though. Town folks say that the speedway is as dirty as they come, and some actually show no hesitation to piss on the ground where they're standing.

Sounds fun, yet I live about three minutes away and I have never had the urge to go. But there are three places my friends and I do go to, hangouts of sorts.

• Bick's.

Bick's is short for Biekford's. It's a restaurant that is open 24 hours. Call it a restaurant that has a little bit of everything, though little that is tasty. It can be seen as a truck stop, because truckers do flock there on their late-night runs.



Andrew Bryce

To my friends and me, though, it is just the place to go in the wee hours of the morning. Why Biekford's? No, not because the place sports the same colors as St. Bonaventure's uniforms. And not because of the supposed greasy food stench my friend says he gets each time he goes in.

First, they are the only place around that's open 24 hours. A bunch of us go often, whether it was a fun night or a sober night. It's a place to sit down, have a bottomless cup of coffee, and my friends have the opportunity to smoke a pack of cigarettes in a sitting.

We know the feisty waitresses and they know us well enough not to give us menus. Besides special cases, they know it's just coffee. And they expect us — which thinking of it now kind of scares me.

When we sit down, sometimes it's two of us, other times it turns into a high school reunion where there are about 15. When we have a double-digit amount of people, someone usually doesn't pay their check. So, my friend who unwillingly is the most well-known regular of the regulars, is nice enough to pick up the unpaid tab.

The conversations are endless. Four cups of coffee and a crapload of stories make for long periods of hysterical laughter in addition to serious dialogue that usually has absolutely no bearing on life whatsoever.

Bick's is always there, always open — and so are we after 1 a.m.

• There is Yan and Yans, me and my buddy's favorite Chinese restaurant. We go in there, take a seat at the bar, drink some beers, and chow on Chinese food. How can you beat that? My buddy goes in there often even when I'm here at school. They should call it Yan and Lopes'.

We even carved our initials in one of the tables when we went there once in high school. Ah, to be a bad boy again.

• There is also this local pizza joint up the street. For what seems like all my life, this Italian family in my neighborhood has kept the place going. The father, the mother, the four brothers — all work for the place, and have done so for years.

The dialogue in there cracks me up. Bick's has its own atmosphere, as does this pizza joint. The embellishing that the four brothers do is amazing, and we try to catch these guys in a lie.

Anytime you want to hear dirt thrown around about the people in the town, this is the place to be. Just order yourself a pepperoni pizza. What's special about the pepperoni pizza at this pizza joint is that the pepperoni slices are cup-shaped and filled with grease. Shots of grease on pizza. Yummy.

These are just three restaurants that we eat and hang out in. It depends upon the mood we're in but we somehow have a good time at all of them. I guess the key is to go somewhere you can bust on rather easily.

However, I still refuse to go to that filthy speedway.

A lack of "Respect" for the oldies

While I was home this past December and January, I had the opportunity to watch mass quantities of MTV. For those of you who live on campus, it's almost like an addiction. I catch up on all my episodes of "The Real World," watch "Yo! MTV Raps", and "MTV's House of Style." I also watch it for the videos.

It said one thing: MTV & the Hall of Fame don't care about the groups that built the industry and the people who still listen to them.

Marni E. Helfner

For the past few weeks, MTV has been running their show from the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame Induction Ceremony incessantly. The inductees were of a wide variety from Janis Joplin and Frank Zappa to the Allman Brothers Band and Martha and the Vandellas.

I'm not complaining about who was inducted — every single one of them deserved it. It's how the Hall of Fame sold out to MTV.

MTV ran dozens of clips on the building of the new Hall of Fame building in Cleveland, ran promos, did a pre-Hall of Fame Induction Ceremony show, and ran unplugged performances of the inductees after the ceremony.

In exchange for all that publicity, MTV got to decide who was really an inductee and who wasn't. This stems from how the show was produced. The groups and artists that are "red-hot, right-now" got considerably more time and air play. Obviously, MTV wanted people to think that Neil Young, Led Zeppelin and Janis Joplin were far more important than Martha and the Vandellas, The Orioles and The Allman Brothers Band.

The former were allowed to speak as long as they wanted and their performances weren't edited. Martha and The Vandellas, The Orioles and The Allman Brothers Band all had their performances spliced together with acceptance speeches, they were portrayed in the opening films as has- beens and were generally treated as less than deserving of the award.

Sure, they all deserved everything they got at the awards but by not editing some sections and editing others, the producers created a great distinction between the two groups.

By demeaning these older groups, MTV made a bold and loud statement that the girl and guy groups of the '50s and '60s that came out of Motown, Cleveland and the South have no place in our rock and roll history. Sorry to say it, but most of these groups were the foundation of the groups of today and a majority of the "classic rock" groups of the '70s and '80s. Led Zeppelin, Jimi Hendrix and Frank Zappa all built off the work of those who came before them.

As a child, I grew up with a great appreciation of music from the '50s and '60s because it was all my mother listened to. I'm probably one of few twenty-somethings that knows who Cousin Brucey is. I listened to Aretha, Smokey Robinson and the Miracles, the Beach Boys, Martha and the Vandellas, the Four Tops, The Supremes, The Shirelles, The Temptations, The Platters, etc., all through my young life. I can still sing (though not too well) all the words to most of their songs. When MTV decided to dis Martha and the Vandellas, it was a hard blow to me.

It said one thing: MTV & the Hall of Fame don't care about the groups that built the industry and the people who still listen to them. Oldies stations are still strong and artists today are still re-recording works from these artists.

When MTV and a generation deny the history of where our music originated, then we deny a history of ourselves. We deny ourselves the opportunity to see our music for what it truly is — a combination of today and yesterday.

UMass teams up with other schools to offer students future job placement

Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has joined forces with another school and other businesses to improve the building materials industry.

On Jan. 13 at the World Trade Center in Boston, UMass, Massachusetts Bay Community College (MBCC) and the Northeast Retail Lumber Association based in Rochester, N.Y., combined their efforts to form the Higher Education/Building Materials Industry Consortium.

"The goal was to tailor the program to really suit the industry's needs," said Professor Paul Fisette, director of the building materials technology and management program at UMass.

The consortium will help graduates move into entry-level jobs. There are 65 building materials and wood technology majors at UMass, including undergraduate and graduate students, Fisette said. The department is within the College of Food and Natural Resources.

UMass, MBCC partnership

The Industrial Advisory Board was formed seven years ago. It consists of more than 20 members representing businesses who have worked with the administrations of UMass and MBCC, Fisette said.

The businesses include Georgia Pacific, Andersen Windows and The Cowls Companies, among others. They are based in Rockaway, N.J., Portsmouth, N.H. and North Amherst, Mass., respectively.

David Levinson, associate dean of liberal arts and businesses at MBCC, which is located in Wellesley Hills, cited different areas where the pact will be beneficial.

"There will be more and more partnership activities with [UMass]," Levinson said. "Our schools will complement one another."

Students at MBCC earn a two-year associate's degree and then have the option to enroll here or enter the work force, he said.

Resource for educated work force

Much opportunity is expected to be created as a direct result of the venture that will benefit the students who choose to enter the work-force, Levinson said.

Paul C. Jones, co-owner of The Cowls Companies, is pleased with the consortium and considers it a success.

"It was the industry's desire to create a resource for an educated work force, including sales and customer service people," Jones said. "You can't take anyone off the street and put them in the lumber yard.

"Building materials and wood technology at UMass has done a nice job in forming a curriculum that is capable of turning out a valuable graduating class larger than the year before and putting it into lumber and forest products jobs so that the industry has a large resource of talent," he said.

The advisory board focused on the northeastern region of the United States to implement the program, Fisette said. Businesses that are members of the consortium are based in Massachusetts, New York, New Hampshire, Connecticut and New Jersey.

After UMass and the advisory board joined forces, they looked eastward, where they could again expand the program. MBCC was selected and the option for further expansion to other schools currently remains open, Fisette said.

100 percent job placement

Georgia Pacific, a wholesale company, does $12 billion- worth of business a year. Graduates of MBCC and/or UMass are prepared to join firms such as these and tap into an occupation, Fisette said.

Edward Godek, a senior building materials and wood technology major at UMass, commended the consortium in regard to his and his colleagues' future, including when the venture was in the later stages of planning.

"It's great. It will help us to provide a steady flow of students to jobs," Godek said. "The '94 [building materials and wood technology] graduates had 100 percent job-placement. The companies were looking to hire."

Paul Dean, the director of education and employee development at the North-East Retail Lumber Association, is pleased with the consortium and looks forward to benefits he expects to be reaped.

"It's a wonderful partnership between industry, trade association and academia," Dean said. "UMass certainly has acted as a driving force in fulfilling the niche of retail-level employees."

Murder In The First receives a harsh sentence

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

MURDER IN THE FIRST
Directed by Marco Rocco
with Christian Slater, Kevin Bacon & Gary Oldman

For all of Murder in the First's passionate moralizing, swirling camera work and decent performances, it's surprisingly uninteresting — kind of like an ersatz Davey & Goliath episode crossed with a watered-down A Few Good Men directed by Sam Raimi.

This is not a compliment.

Murder wants to be an inspiring tale of real-life courage, with pretty-boy Christian Slater rescuing a near-feral Kevin Bacon (accused of murdering a fellow inmate on his first day released from over three years in solitary) from the dehumanizing evils of Alcatraz and more specifically, the prison's sadistic warden (Gary Oldman).

Yet for all of its good intentions, it's far too predigested to make any impact — the film hasn't any room for moral ambiguities because it's too busy pigeon-holing its characters into strict good and evil signifiers. Despite watchable, sometimes excellent performances (specifically Bacon, who wisely underplays what could have been a showy role), the meat of the movie is just time-filler until the very predictable courtroom showdown (I've seen "Matlock" episodes with more suspense).

And finally, will someone please tell neophyte director Rocco (whose previous debut was the laughably preachy runaway drama Where the Day Takes You) that spinning the camera in all directions, dipping up and down and perching on all sorts of arch and obtuse angles does not create or add to the drama unless there is drama to begin with. It only serves to make the viewer sick. That is if, in the case of this movie, they're not asleep first. C

DEATH AND THE MAIDEN
Directed by Roman Polanski with Sigourney Weaver, Ben Kingsley

While Murder in the First lacked enough moral ambiguity to propel its central conflict, Roman Polanski's (Rosemary's Baby, Chinatown) latest film swims in it. It's less a political film than a vehemently personal one — a tense, claustrophobic moral thriller that spins on the anxieties of the characters.

Maiden is based on Ariel Dorfman's 1992 play, originally staged by Mike Nichols (Wolf) and starring Gene Hackman, Richard Dreyfuss and Tony winner Glenn Close. I had the distinct displeasure to see this production — poorly directed and uninvolvingly acted, it could have been an all-star "Three's Company" episode as far as everyone was concerned.

The story is set in an unnamed South American country after the fall of the dictatorship (presumably Chile). On a dark and stormy night at a secluded villa, an intensely neurotic woman (Sigourney Weaver) believes her husband's new friend (Ben Kingsley) is the man who raped and tortured her years earlier. Tied up and gagged in the living room, Kingsley is put on trial by Weaver while her lawyer husband is forced to defend him.

In theory, the one-set drama is tailor-made for the stage, although Polanski manages to mine the close quarters deeper on film than Nichols ever dared. Ostensibly it's a revenge fantasy, but there are doubts afoot and Polanski allows us to both support and decry Weaver's actions. The interplay between Weaver and Kingsley — both smart, talented actors — is endlessly fascinating to watch, and it is their performances that transcend some of Polanski's forgivable manipulations. Be warned though — while Maiden is viscerally powerful, its ending is more haunting than satisfying. And it is this commendable bit of subtlety that makes Maiden a memorable voyage. B+

On Before Sunrise:

While many reviewers are praising Richard Linklater's (Dazed & Confused) latest film, there is still something left mentioning about how truly extraordinary the film is. Linklater manages, in the midst of delivering a refreshingly non-derivative romantic comedy, to create some beautifully potent romantic imagery. And in this age of derivative (Sleepless in Seattle) and processed (The Bodyguard) romantic movies, it's even more of a feat.

It's not only how Linklater uses the amorous scope of Vienna as an aphrodisiac (the early-morning snapshots of all the places the couple visited is remarkably effective, blending memory and regret into an irresistibly bittersweet concoction) but how he invigorates many of the couple's scenes with a keen sense of tender humanity that's warmly sensual without being schmaltzy. See Before Sunrise — one of the most romantic movies ever.

Area events show Black history, arts

The following are the arts highlights in the Five College area for the first two weeks of Black History Month. Additional unlisted events will be featured in future issues.

Feb. 2: The Augusta Savage Gallery, located in New Africa House, will be host to the works of multicultural artists from Sag Harbor, N.Y. The exhibition, entitled "Power of the Spirit," will run through Mar. 1.

Feb. 5: An exhibit entitled "Metamorphosis of our Ancestors" premieres at the Northampton Center for the Arts. Featured in the show is the work of UMass Afro- American Studies Professor Dorrance Hill.

Feb. 7: Two short films by African–American writer/director Julie Dash will be shown at 7 p.m. in the Augusta Savage Gallery as part of the gallery's film series. Dash first found critical acclaim with the release of her feature, "Daughters of the Dust."

Feb. 10: The Black Mass Communications Project sponsors "Da Chocolate Mix Dating Game" at the Student Union Ballroom. Based on the popular television game show, the main event will be followed by a dance.

Feb. 12: Four musicians (Wes Brown, Kalpana Devi, Fenibo Kalaiwo and Bheki Khosa) will be on hand at 3 p.m. at the Northampton Center for the Arts. The program is a presentation of traditional and original South and West African music.

Feb. 14: Distinguished African–American poet Samuel Allen makes an appearance at the Augusta Savage Gallery at 7 p.m. Allen, a Boston resident, has published four highly regarded collections over four decades, the latest being 1987's Every Round and Other Poems.

Feb. 17: The event entitled "Afro–Latin Folklorico," an exploration of the roots and evolution of West African music, kicks off at 8 p.m. Three area bands will perform the rhythmically complex, percussion-oriented music.

Feb. 18: Bowker Auditorium presents "Around the Table," a comedy sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns. Four Big Girls, a Seattle–based African– American lesbian troupe, star in this original work.

Vampires, CEOs, soup and essays make for diverse reading

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

While college students might not be reading overly intellectual works in their spare time, at least they're reading.

Cartoon collections, comedian monologues and vampire tales rank high on students' reading lists, according to this month's "Campus Paperback Bestsellers" list compiled by the Association of American Publishers/National Association of College Stores.

Heading the top of the chart is Homicidal Psycho Cat by Bill Watterson, the latest collection of the ever popular "Calvin and Hobbes" cartoon. Of course, whether or not it qualifies as reading may be debatable, but everyone has to start somewhere.

In second place is Disclosure, by famed writer Michael Crichton. Made into a box office smash, the book centers around sabotage, sexual harassment and the ever growing field of CD ROMS and interactive programs. Great for all those who weren't impressed by Demi Moore's show of daring decollete and Michael Douglas looking helpless under the whim of yet another woman. And if you love Crichton books made into movies, look out for Congo coming out this summer. Its plot centers around science, archaeology and killer primates — hey, it worked for Jurassic Park.

Third place is taken by the queen of bloodsuckers, Anne Rice. Interview With the Vampire has been resurrected after it too was turned into a box office thriller. Of course, don't expect film to imitate fiction. This book will show you just how different book adaptations can really be — plus it explains a lot of things surface-scratching just couldn't do justice to in the film. Expect yet another installment in the Vampire Chronicles within the year.

The following current best-sellers, listed in no particular order, give one cause to wonder if someone has redefined the definition of good reading:

• The Curse of Madam "C" will satisfy the appetites of Gary Larson fans who are still lamenting his retirement. This collection features all the oldies but goodies and is yet another cartoon-based "novel" college fans crave.

• A collection of essays entitled Wouldn't Take Nothing for my Journey Now by Maya Angelou should help keep literature lovers awake for a while and provide plenty of food for thought.

• Seinlanguage is the book for all "Seinfeld" fans by (of course) Jerry Seinfeld. Packed full of wacky monologues form his show plus more — it's a good read for those who need a dose of positive energy. This goes double for the author himself, who broke up with his 19–year–old girlfriend.

• And speaking of doses, Chicken Soup for the Soul by Jack Canfield and Mark Victor Hansen is a pseudo–medical remedy for all that ails the humble spirit. From broken hearts to soul–searching questions, the book will provide proper nourishment.

Helmet prepares to assault Pearl St.

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — On Feb. 6, fans of Helmet will have the opportunity to catch a rare local performance from New York City's preeminent hardcore/metal fusion outfit. They will be headlining a triple bill at Pearl Street nightclub that will also feature NYC hardcore legends Sick Of It All and Kepone.

In recent years, Helmet's distinctive blend of raw aggression and highly talented musicianship have elevated them above their legions of imitators and into the national spotlight.

Formed in early 1989, Helmet quickly established a formidable reputation on the local New York scene based on the strength of their renowned live shows. The band first garnered national attention with their acclaimed full length debut Strap It On, which breathed new life into the metal– core genre pioneered by bands like Killing Joke and Prong.

The enormously positive reaction they received for their subsequent tour throughout the United States and Europe led to their signing with Interscope Records in early 1992. Later that year, they released their highly successful Meantime LP, which essentially redefined the conventional roles of heavy metal and hardcore, merging them into a distinct style which has become Helmet's trademark sound.

One of the key ingredients to this sound is the fierce dual guitar assault of Page Hamilton and Rob Echeverria. Backed by the surgically precise rhythm section of bassist Henry Bogdan and drummer John Stanier, Helmet's music is simply relentless.

Hamilton's vocals serve as the perfect punctuation to this sound, delivering even the most obscure lyrics with authority.

New guitarist Rob Echeverria (formerly of the NYC hardcore acts Straight Ahead and Rest In Pieces) joined Helmet for the final leg of the Meantime tour and the chemistry he developed with the rest of the band earned him a permanent slot in the line-up.

Singer/guitarist Page Hamilton sights the addition of Echeverria and an increased sense of collaboration as the primary factor in the band's continued success and musical development.

"Working with the new line-up has been really smooth," Page said. "It's great to have Rob's flamenco blood adding spice to the stew. Working on Henry's songs was interesting as well. It was the first time I'd ever sang to music I hadn't written."

The band's new album, Betty, is both a continuation and re–interpretation of their standard sound. Many songs maintain the adrenaline–drenched onslaught fans have come to expect from Helmet while others display a new awareness of groove and melody that makes the new material both more accessible and challenging.

Also appearing on the bill will be Sick Of It All. Formed in 1985 by Lou and Pete Koller, the band established their reputation early on as one of the chief participants in the now–infamous "Sunday Matinee's" at CBGB's, which showcased such punk and hardcore legends as Agnostic Front, Youth Of Today and Murphy's Law, to name just a few.

Now, after a decade of playing together, Sick Of It All have released their first major label album, Scratch the Surface, and increased exposure is enabling them to bring their brand of old school New York hardcore to a national audience.

Helmet, with opening acts Sick Of It All and Kepone, will perform an all ages show at Pearl Street nightclub in Northampton on Feb. 6 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $12 in advance and are available at Tix Unlimited in the UMass Student Union and For The Record in Amherst. Contact Pearl Street for more information.

COURTESY PENNIE SMITH

Roses' Second Coming well worth the wait

By Martyn Bone
Collegian Staff

SECOND COMING
The Stone Roses
Geffen Records

In 1989, four young Mancunians with floppy flares and an assortment of top tunes finally delivered an album almost five years after the release of their obscure first single. They were anointed, by themselves in gloriously messianic/satanic song titles like "I Am the Resurrection," and by the British press and public, as saviours of the music scene — what the world was waiting for.

They released two more singles before ascending into an enigmatic otherworld (Wales, apparently, where Second Coming was recorded), while simultaneously descending into the hell of record contract disputes and court appearances.

While other "Madchester" prophets like Happy Mondays died an ignominious death, the Roses have survived by virtue of their mythical, miraculous disappearance, though certain disbelievers suggested they simply had no tunes or had turned into Led Zeppelin.

So for another five years all was silent and then the Second Coming was heralded by a flurry of eight–page eulogies in the British music press — before the album was widely dismissed as journalists scrambled to laud Oasis, Mancunian descendants un–immaculately conceived from the original Roses covenant. And now, a month later, the album is finally released in America. But will it be a revelation?

Echoing the imagery of the first album is the title of the 11–minute opening track, "Breaking into Heaven." Ian Brown's slinky vocals slide in over John Squire's guitar and the prodigal sons are forgiven. But this is not 1989 revisited. And when "Driving South" rides in upon a rock–out riff, it is evident that, to progress, the Roses have gone back to the future — to about 1971, to early Zeppelin and Sticky Fingers Stones.

Back beyond that, the 1930s' Robert Johnson crossroads contract with the devil myth is evoked in a contemporary context — "You ain't too young and pretty and you sure as hell can't sing / But if you want to sell your soul, I've got a toll–free number you can ring," is followed by an evil chorus of "0800 treble 6, oh yeah." This is what we need when the other Roses — Guns N' — are high in the British singles charts with a massacre of "Sympathy for the Devil."

"Daybreak" celebrates civil rights saint Rosa Parks and asserts, "Black bones were the original bones and this the whole wide world should know." Meanwhile, "Love Spreads" suggests the messiah was a black woman whose brother — singer Brown — will offer godlike forgiveness to the man who raped her. Cynics might suggest that there should be rather more evidence of black musical influence on the album itself, beyond the obvious worship of Hendrix guitar histrionics and the Johnson reference. The funk on "Straight to the Man," along with "Daybreak," which is the weakest track, is half–baked.

These two songs and "Begging You" are the only tracks not credited to John Squire alone, so that conventional opinion that Squire is the true genius here is hard to rebuke. He writes all the other songs and indelibly embellishes each track with his defining guitar craft (he also created the cover collage). "Good Times" transcends its sub–Oasis rock n'roll simplicity with some superb guitar work, while "Tears" and "Tightrope" (despite the innocuous titles) are rendered classic by Squire's singular songwriting sublimity.

"Ten Storey Love Song" most conspicuously resembles the debut album, and might make any doubters appalled by the redirection of "Love Spreads" and "Driving South" recant. Those who had hoped the Roses would develop the funk dance trance of "Fools' Gold" will only be partly pacified by the insistent guitar gymnastics of "Begging You." So it might then take the uninitiated or open–minded to most appreciate the album. Those hoping for a sequel to the debut, or expecting the perfect epitome of five years' aesthetic effort, will be inevitably disappointed.

So a second coming for the Stone Roses and quite possibly a second coming of the infamous British Invasion (1964, not 1776). Not since the Beatles and the Stones has British popular music been so manifestly healthier than its American cousin. As Ian Brown sings at one point, "Your star will shine again," but for now, a maligned album released in Britain in 1994 seems to face few contenders to be one of the best albums released in America in 1995. Vital, not Vitalogy. (A+)

Nuclear plant trying to explain pipe cap missing for a month

By Jose Martinez
Associated Press

BOSTON — Nuclear regulators want to know why Pilgrim Nuclear Power Station ran for nearly a month without a cap at the end of a quarter-inch pipe that leads from a chamber beneath the reactor to an instrument panel.

Technicians at the Plymouth nuclear plant discovered the cap was missing during a routine inspection on Dec. 28 — 29 days after the reactor was restarted after a three-month shutdown to rebuild a generator.

Pilgrim officials have since replaced the plug and conducted their own investigation into what happened.

"We are taking this very seriously," Peggy Markson, a spokeswoman for Boston Edison Co., said Wednesday.

The NRC has scheduled an enforcement conference with Boston Edison officials, including chief executive officer Tom May and senior vice president Tom Boulette, for Feb. 7 at the commission's office in King of Prussia, Pa.

The missing plug should have capped a pipe leading from an instrument panel in the reactor building to a donut-shaped chamber beneath the reactor, which is part of the plant's primary containment system, said NRC spokeswoman Diane Screnci. The reactor building itself is the secondary barrier.

In case of an emergency, the chamber — half-filled with water — gives excess steam from the reactor a place to disperse safely.

Had there been an emergency, gases from the chamber could have escaped into the reactor building through the unplugged line, Markson said. The building then would have to be vented — releasing the potentially radioactive gases into the atmosphere, she said. But the 23-year-old reactor has been running at 100 percent without a hitch.

Records show the line had been inspected on Nov. 22. Standard procedure requires a second technician to double-check the job to make certain everything was done properly.

However, the cap was left off and there was no second signature on the paperwork, Markson said.

New plan to boost student retention

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst has launched a program to address the different interests and characteristics of an increasingly changing student body.

"Enrollment management" is the policy group that will oversee two committees aiming to attract and retain students at the University, said Thomas B. Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs.

The retention committee, enrollment planning and the recruitment committee consist of members of the University faculty, staff and students.

"It is very important that we begin to systematically plan for our enrollment, and plan the kind of strategies that will help and attain our enrollment goals," Robinson said. "Both are very key committees."

Robinson and Provost Pat Crosson initiated the program.

The main responsibility of the retention committee is to keep students at UMass so they can earn a degree, said Javier Cevallos, faculty adviser to the provost and chair of this committee.

"Our most crucial issue is that a large number of students don't come back after their first semester or their first year," Cevallos said.

According to Cevallos, these students predominantly tend to be predominantly freshmen and sophomores.

Some of the reasons students don't return, he said, are because they transferred to a different institution, failed out as a result of "academic woes" or became "lost in the campus environment."

Goals of the enrollment planning and recruitment committee include devising ways in which the University can attract students, said Arlene Cash, director of admissions and a member of this committee.

"This is a critical step in bringing together offices that traditionally have not had a functioning and working group before," Cash said.

Relying on demographic information of prospective students is vital for this committee, she said.

"We ask questions like, 'How is the University perceived? What is the UMass student profile like? What percentage of high school juniors have an interest in attending college? PSAT scores? What do we anticipate as the percentage and number of students where English is not the first language? Are these students we should be recruiting? What is important to students? An academically challenging environment?" Cash said.

Neither committee has held a meeting yet and student members have not yet been clarified, Cevallos said.

However, both Cevallos and Cash said they are counting on these insightful perspectives.

"It is a moral responsibility for students to be as successful as they can be," said Robinson. He cited the "wonderful collaboration" of university departments, schools and offices that make up the committees whose efforts are to improve UMass and maintain a competitive edge.

Committee members represent admissions, financial aid, the College of Arts and Sciences and the Maither Career Center, along with many others.

"It depends on the personality of people," Cevallos said. "Some students like large schools, some like small schools. We want the best possible environment for everybody."

UWW aids working adults in earning degree

By Colleen D. Shanahan
Collegian Staff

The University Without Walls (UWW) will be holding seven information sessions to inform prospective students who may benefit from a program which assists working adults in achieving a degree.

The mission of UWW is to provide a program through which working adults and others can attend, said Dr. Edward Golding, an advisor at UWW.

Most of the 250 students enrolled in the program have completed college through their junior or senior year. Some have received their associate degree but do not have their bachelor degree. Still more of those enrolled are returning UMass students who may have changed their minds as to career goals.

The majority of students are in their 40s, and some are in their 60s or 70s. However, some of the students enrolled in UWW are in their mid-20s.

The goal of UWW "is to allow those who might not be able to attend UMass on a full-time basis to attend and receive their degree of choice," Golding said.

According to Golding, UWW students are mostly adults who find it nearly impossible to attain a degree in the traditional fashion because of work, family obligations or other reasons.

To achieve this goal, UWW works with the University and other departments to provide access to the courses and resources on campus.

Each student can create his or her own degree that utilizes past college credits and creates an area of concentration.

In pursuing a major, content would be defined by the department as to which courses must be taken, yet the major is still individualized by the student.

The University Without Walls also offers the possibility of being credited for work experience.

Over 1,300 students have received degrees through the UWW. The program began in 1971 and includes the Five College Consortium. Courses required by the program include the "Degree Development Program," which allows students to consider what they have done and what they now want to do.

Other required courses include "Perspectives on Learning," geared to assist returning students in getting back into the swing of classes and utilizing resources.

The "Writing About Experience" course fulfills the junior year writing requirement and creates a portfolio of the students' work.

UWW students are also eligible for financial aid. Anyone interested in UWW should attend an information session to learn more about the program. Sessions are held in Amherst (545-1378) or Springfield (732-5262). Information sessions will be held on Feb. 11 and 22, Mar. 4, 15 and 30, and April 4 and 8.

The application deadline for fall admission is April 15.

GLB offers students new activities

Brown bag series, hotlines and Internet inform community

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Ten years ago, there were few resources or services available to the gay, lesbian and bisexual (GLB) student communities or others who wanted information on GLB issues.

Then in the fall of 1985, the University of Massachusetts Student Affairs Division established the Program for GLB Concerns. Since then, the program has grown to include a diverse range of resources and services and to make these available to as many people as possible, both on campus and off.

Special events

One of the most popular activities is the Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Studies Brown Bag Lunch Series. Each Wednesday from noon to 1:30 p.m. in the Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center, the program sponsors speakers who address a wide variety of GLB and gender issues.

Some speakers are drawn from UMass faculty and graduate schools, while others are brought in from places across the country. Topics range from lesbians in business to GLB history to transsexuality. All lectures are free, wheelchair accessible, and open to the public.

In addition to the Brown Bag lectures, the Program for GLB Concerns sponsors dozens of special events each semester, including concerts, theater pieces, workshops, films and more.

This month, the Program is offering two events: a stand-up comedy act by Bill Graber on Feb. 4 and a theater piece by African-American comedy group 4 Big Girls on Feb. 18.

GLB education

Education is a primary goal of the program, and one of the strongest tools in its effort is the UMass Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Speakers' Bureau. The Bureau is made up of a group of volunteers — GLB and heterosexual allies — who travel around campus and local communities sharing their individual experiences.

With personal stories and a question-and-answer session, the Bureau gives classroom, student and community groups the chance to learn about the lives and concerns of GLB people.

Resources and support

The Program office in Crampton House, Southwest Residential Area, has available a wide range of additional GLB resources, including a 1,200-volume book, magazine and video lending library. Local resource listings are available on a computer data-base and the program has a large offering of pamphlets, posters and other materials.

The program is staffed from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday, with individuals ready to answer questions, offer referrals and provide support for victims of homophobic discrimination and harassment.

Hotlines and Internet services

Blatant is a monthly newsletter published by the program that outlines its many events, services and resources. Copies can be picked up at the Program office in Crampton or mailed directly.

A 24-hour telephone information service is also available by calling 54-LAMDA. The hotline provides information on events, the Speaker's Bureau, AIDS, sexually transmitted diseases, sexual orientation, local GLB support groups, counseling and much more.

Beginning in mid-February, the program will begin operating an information service on the UMass gopher. Students and other individuals from places all over the Internet will be able to access information on UMass GLB resources, national politics, civil rights and GLB bulletin boards.

Prosecution opens in Abdel-Rahman trial

By Larry Neumeister
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman was not a humble cleric but a powerful terrorist who had hundreds of thousands of dollars in the bank, the government said Wednesday.

The allegations were made in court but out of the jury's presence after testimony began in the trial following opening statements by 13 lawyers.

Twelve Muslims are accused of planning to attack several New York landmarks in a bid to force the United States to change its Middle East policy.

On Monday, the sheik's lawyer, Lynne Stewart, had portrayed the 56-year-old blind cleric as a man of modest means.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald scoffed at that Wednesday as he tried to enter into evidence a photograph of FBI agents counting money on the shoik's bed after raiding his Jersey City, N.J., apartment.

"Living in modest means," he said with sarcasm. "He has hundreds of thousands of dollars in bank accounts and $61,000 in 100 dollar bills sitting in his apartment."

U.S. District Judge Michael Mukasey said he would allow testimony about the money to be put before the jury on Thursday.

The prosecution began its case with two FBI witnesses.

Agent Harlen L. Bell testified about what he found in Abdel-Rahman's apartment when a search warrant was served on June 24, 1993.

Fitzgerald also asked him about a May 23, 1993, conversation Abdel-Rahman had with another defendant in the case and a government informant about whether it was right to bomb the United Nations and FBI headquarters.

Bell said the conversation was taped.

Taped conversations, which number in the hundreds, are expected to be a key ingredient in the prosecution's efforts to convict the defendants of a Civil War-era charge of seditious conspiracy. If found guilty, they could face life in prison.

The defendants' targets allegedly included the Holland and Lincoln tunnels and George Washington Bridge, which connect New York City with New Jersey, as well as the U.N. and FBI headquarters.

They also allegedly plotted to assassinate Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and kidnap former President Nixon and Henry Kissinger.

UM students tutor in local schools

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The Tutoring Enrichment Assistance Models with Schools (TEAMS) tutoring project continues to offer students the opportunity to make a difference and to experience teaching firsthand.

TEAMS has been helping local schools from elementary to high school by offering college students to act as tutors for over 10 years, said Kacie McCollum, TEAMS project manager.

"We've had over 65,000 tutoring hours," said McCollum. "Hundreds of people come here."

According to McCollum, TEAMS offers a three-credit course, Education 497I, "Tutoring in Schools," which meets once a week. Students are then required to complete 60 hours of tutoring during the semester and may be required to participate in seminars about there experience as a tutor and on issues of equality in schools.

"We find them invaluable," said Inga Ackermann, an English as a Second Language (ESL) teacher and contact for TEAMS. "It's a super project. We've had eight tutors to each school."

Teachers give TEAMS tutors students who feel they need extra help. Although any student can be tutored on any subject, TEAMS tutors usually assist children of foreign parents develop their English skills. Tutors who are semi- fluent in Spanish, Chinese or Cambodian are especially helpful, Ackermann said.

"We had one tutor who was learning Chinese who tutored a Chinese student," said Ackermann. "She helped him with his English and he helped her with Chinese."

Brooke McDonald, a senior English major, was a tutor for TEAMS during the 1994 fall semester.

"It was terrific," said McDonald. "I got along great [with the kids]."

According to McDonald, there was some initial concern that her students would be embarrassed by their selection for special attention by their teachers, McDonald said, so building a friendly relationship with the students is necessary to help them learn.

Julie Allegro, a sophomore majoring in sociology, was also a TEAMS tutor. According to Allegro, she often tutored ESL students because she knew some Spanish.

"It was incredible," said Allegro. "It took up a lot of time but it was worth it."

Lila Feingold, a classroom paraprofessional for the ESL department at the high school in Amherst, is also the school's liaison to TEAMS.

"I have always found TEAMS incredibly helpful," said Feingold. "It's a great program for both sides."

Because both the junior and senior high schools in Amherst run on a rotating eight-day schedule, students, teachers and tutors sometimes experience frustration when it comes to scheduling.

"It breaks the flow. It's a real problem, but there's no real way to resolve it," Feingold said.

According to Ackermann, tutoring allows the individual to become a role model for their student.

"There's nothing dramatic about this. Students are just there. It's a steady, daily process," said Ackermann. "That's the drama."

Businesses bundled cash for Weld

By Katharine Webster
Associated Press

BOSTON — Much of the $4 million raised by Gov. William F. Weld for his 1994 election campaign came from businesses that "bundled" donations by top executives, board members and their families, according to a study released Wednesday.

"Private business interests are purchasing a particular business climate," said Carin Schiewe, director of the Commonwealth Coalition, a progressive group that advocates public financing of elections.

The study by the Commonwealth Education Project, the research arm of the coalition, shows that a tiny percentage of voters — mostly wealthy men affiliated with large private firms — plays a disproportionate role in campaigns, Schiewe said.

One computer company, EMC Corp., bundled $109,000 in contributions, the study found. Altogether, more than $640,000 in contributions appeared to be bundled by individual companies, said researcher Mark Norton.

Bundling allows corporations to do an end run around laws limiting donations by political action committees and lobbyists, said Nathan Gibson, executive director of Common Cause, a government watchdog group.

"It raises the question of whether the average citizen is able to participate effectively in elections," he said.

Raymond Howell, spokesman for Weld's campaign, said average voters as well as business people clearly supported Weld's agenda, since Weld won with 71 percent of the vote last November.

"This is a pro-business, pro-economic growth administration, so I'm not surprised that the business community was supportive during the campaign," Howell said.

The study found three-quarters of the $4,051,208 raised by Weld came from people who donated between $500 and the legal limit of $1,000 in 1993 and 1994.

Of those large donors whose employers could be identified, 98 percent were affiliated with private business interests — with the insurance, real estate and financial industries and lawyers leading the pack.

And nearly one-third of Weld's warchest came from out of state: $1,009,500, or more than the entire amount of $997,247 raised by Weld's Democratic opponent, Mark Roosevelt.

"Elections are for sale, and the price of admission is too high," Schiewe said.

But that isn't Weld's fault, she said.

"This is not a personal indictment of Gov. Weld or any other politician," Schiewe said. "Many of the same contributors appear on lists for other elected officials and ballot questions."

Contributions rarely are tied to specific votes or decisions, she said. Rather, business executives see political contributions as a "security blanket" that will ensure a friendly environment, she said.

Brodeuressque season. If not, it could be nightmares with my cousin Vinny.

• How far has Bob Essensa's stock fallen? The once rising star in the Winnipeg organization is so low on the Detroit (if you have the pads you can play goalie for us) Red Wings depth chart, they loaned him to the San Diego Gulls.

• With the addition of the new Worcester Ice Cats, there are now four minor league teams in New England: Springfield, Worcester, Providence and Hartford.

• If the names Bettman (not the subject of a Pearl Jam song) and Goodenow (could be the subject of a Beck song) were not mentioned all season, would anyone miss them?

• Perhaps the biggest lockout casualty is the retirement of longtime Bruins radio announcer Bob Wilson. He tasted what retirement would be like during the strike and decided he liked it.

The Hall of Famer is a legend, and will be sorely missed by Bruins fans young and old, including this one.

Shanahan named Denver head coach

Former San Francisco assistant leaves; led team to Bowl win

By John Mossman
Associated Press

DENVER — Another Super Bowl won, another assistant coach lost. In what is becoming an NFL trend, Mike Shanahan became the latest assistant to cash in on a Super Bowl victory by landing a head coaching job elsewhere.

When Dallas won the Super Bowl two years ago, defensive coordinator Dave Wannstedt left for the Chicago Bears. Then last year, the Cowboys repeated and lost offensive coordinator Norv Turner to the Washington Redskins.

Now Shanahan, credited with devising the offense that generated seven touchdowns for San Francisco against San Diego, has been hired to reconstruct his old team, the Denver Broncos. Shanahan, whose seven-year tenure as a Broncos' assistant included three Super Bowl appearances, was hired Tuesday night by owner Pat Bowlen.

The 49ers offensive coordinator reportedly turned down a lucrative offer to stay in San Francisco that would have doubled his salary to nearly $1 million a year with the promise to succeed coach George Seifert. He also was believed to have been offered about $1 million a year to coach the Philadelphia Eagles. Instead, he signed with the Broncos for seven years worth at least $7 million.

"Deep down inside me, I always wanted this job," he said. "My family and I love Denver. This feels like home. I'm happy to be back as part of the family."

Shanahan, 42, was the architect of one of the NFL's most fearsome offenses the last three seasons, and the 49ers' drive to the Super Bowl title made him a hot coaching commodity. Despite his relative youth, his credentials are lengthy — and impressive.

He was a graduate assistant at Oklahoma in 1975 when the Sooners won a national championship. At Northern Arizona in 1977, Shanahan's offense set school records. His offensive innovations helped Eastern Illinois win the NCAA Division II national championship in 1978.

As offensive coordinator at Minnesota in 1979, Shanahan's offense set school records. At Florida in the early 1980s, more records fell. Shanahan served two stints in Denver, 1984-87 and 1989-91, mostly as offensive coordinator, nurturing a young John Elway into one of the NFL's premier passers.

The only black mark on his record was his brief stint as coach of the Los Angeles Raiders. Shanahan, regarded as an outsider by the close-knit Raider organization and never given full control, went 8-12 when he was fired four games into his second season.

Bowlen pursued Shanahan two years ago after Dan Reeves was fired. But the pair couldn't come to terms and Bowlen turned to Wade Phillips, who went 16-17 in two seasons and was fired Dec. 29. This time, Bowlen got his man.

"This is a long-term commitment on both Mike's part and my part, a seven-year deal," Bowlen said at a press conference. "Mike will have full control of the football operation, thank God. That's what I want."

The deal took five hours to hammer out — two hours in Miami after the Super Bowl, and three hours in Denver after Shanahan arrived in a late-afternoon flight on Tuesday.

"Two years ago, I just felt the timing wasn't right," Shanahan said. "I felt I needed to prove myself more. Now, it feels perfect. I feel very comfortable with the situation. It was easy to say 'yes.'" He said the lure of the Denver job overshadowed any other offers.

"My first seven years here, the tradition, the commitment to winning and being part of that commitment are something I'll cherish for a long time," he said. "My job is to have the type of program here that we'll all be proud of and eventually can get us to a championship level and playing in the Super Bowl. It's not going to happen overnight.

"But I'm used to winning, and that's what this organization is all about. I will hire a quality coaching staff and get to work. I'm looking forward to a long tenure here."

Sports briefs: Vin Baker will replace Hill

NEW YORK (AP) — Vin Baker of the Milwaukee Bucks, a day after being added to the Eastern Conference All-Star team as a reserve, on Wednesday was selected to play in the NBA Slam-Dunk Championship.

Baker replaced Detroit Pistons rookie Grant Hill, who doesn't want to aggravate a foot problem, according to the league. Hill still is slated to start in the All-Star game Feb. 12 in Phoenix.

Since a player cannot appear both in that game and the rookie game, Trevor Ruffin of the Phoenix Suns on Wednesday replaced Hill on the rookie-game roster.

Jamie Watson of the Utah Jazz will take the place of Robert Pack of the Denver Nuggets in the Slam Dunk. Pack has a sore back, the league said.

Webber featured in Black history spot

NEW YORK (AP) — Chris Webber of the Washington Bullets is featured in the NBA's 1995 public service announcement honoring Black History Month.

The spot, in which Webber recites lines from a poem by Langston Hughes, will be shown Sunday during NBC's coverage of an NBA doubleheader and will continue through the month during game broadcasts on NBC, TNT, TBS and NBA Radio.

Webber is a collector of historic documents from prominent figures in African-American history. His collection includes letters and notes signed by Frederick Douglass, Dr. Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, George Washington Carver and colonial poet Phillias Wheatley. The collection is at Wayne State University in Detroit.

The Eric Martin Celebrity Golf Tournament is the dream of its namesake, a Kansas City Chiefs receiver who played high school ball at Van Vleck in Bay City, a town of 19,000 about 65 miles southwest of Houston.

Martin and the other organizers hope to raise between $60,000 and $100,000, much of which will go to local charities. Some proceeds also will help build a youth center and defray some cancer treatment expenses of Alfred Blackmon Jr., a former Van Vleck star and brother of Seattle Seahawks free safety Robert Blackmon. Martin, who spent 10 years with New Orleans before moving to the Chiefs, has organized the tournament for several years.

Mansell's signing to be announced

LONDON (AP) — Any last-minute hitches involving Nigel Mansell's deal with McLaren-Mercedes have apparently been resolved. The England-based Formula One team confirmed it will announce its 1995 driver lineup on Friday, two days later than originally scheduled.

McLaren said a news conference would be held at a London hotel. While no details were given, it's no secret that Mansell's signing will be announced.

McLaren began negotiating with Mansell after the former world and Indy-car champion was turned down by his old team, Williams Renault, in favor of David Coulthard.

Apparently, the main sticking point in Mansell's negotiations with McLaren has been money. British newspapers reported that Mansell was asking McLaren for $1 million per race for the 16-race season. He is expected to get only half that amount.

St. Joseph's senior Bernard Blunt has had a hard time recovering from his major knee injury.

been very good at working with his mental approach to recovery," Griffin said. "We have an orthopedic surgeon and a therapist that helped him to rehabilitate his knee physically."

Blunt sees improvement in his mental approach from the beginning of the season to now.

"I was healthy, but I think I had a lot of things I had to overcome," Blunt said. "Physically, I had to learn how to trust my body. I'm starting to get it back now.

"I'm only going to get better and better. That's what I look forward to every day when I get up."

Every day, Blunt must wake up and take one step at a time. The physical and mental rehabilitation of a knee injury is long. Is Blunt, however, thinking ahead to playing in the NBA?

"Definitely. I think I'm going to have to prove myself again, but I have no problem with that. You know, just go for it."

■ hoops

Meyer, who provided a spark off the bench. In 15 minutes of action, Meyer had six points, five rebounds, three blocked shots and two steals.

"It was a big thrill. There is nothing I like better than going out and helping the team," Meyer said. "[When Camby went down], I knew we were going to need a spark. You have to step up for that. I was more than happy to come in and fill that role. I'm proud I did. I gained a lot of confidence tonight."

Roe led the way with 19 points and three blocks for UMass. He shot 9-for-10 from the floor as the Hawks had no success against Roe inside.

"They couldn't guard him," Calipari said. "He's back doing the things he should be doing."

The junior small forward duo of Dana Dingle (14 points, eight rebounds) and Donta Bright (11 points) also played well in the victory.

"Donta Bright and Dana Dingle were unbelievable," Calipari said. "Dana was out there diving for loose balls, crashing the boards. . . I thought he was outstanding."

Massachusetts grabbed an early lead but St. Joe's kept it close and eventually took a 22–20 lead on a Reggie Townsend jumper. The Hawks extended their lead to six at 32–26, before the Minutemen made a 6–1 run at the end of the half to cut the deficit to one, to make the score 33–32 at intermission.

The Minutemen rallied, taking the lead they would never relinquish just 52 seconds into the second half.

The Hawks held it close early as the score was 43–40 at 11:20 of the half, but the Minutemen went on a 12–3 run, paced by two treys by Carmelo Travieso, to take the Hawks out of the game.

Inus Norville turned in a solid second half for UMass, with four points, six rebounds and three blocks.

"This was a good win for us," Calipari said. "We overcame injuries and players not playing up to their potential."

St. Joseph's Coach John Griffin was disappointed with the result but not his team's effort.

"We played a competitive game. [Against Massachusetts] you need to play a perfect game. We played a competitive game, but didn't play a perfect game," said Griffin, who has not been surprised that A–10 teams have found playing the No. 1 team in the nation tough. "Teams in the league play UMass competitively. UMass is the overwhelming favorite, but the teams know them well."

The Hawks were led by Townsend (14 points), Mark Bass (12 points) and Bernard Blunt (13 points). Senior Carlin Warley was a monster on the glass, adding a game–high 17 rebounds in the losing effort.

The Minutemen return to action Saturday at noon at George Washington.

Lou Roe – 19 points, 5 rebounds, 3 blocks

Highlights...

The Minutemen were able to overcome injuries to Marcus Camby and Lou Roe on their way to victory. With Camby out, senior Jeff Meyer got quality playing time and made the most of it. In 15 minutes of play, Meyer contributed six points, five rebounds, three blocks and two steals. Before going down late in the second half with a leg cramp, Roe scored a game–high 19 points on 9–10 shooting from the field. Juniors Dana Dingle (14 points, eight rebounds) and Donta Bright (11 points) both played well. Camby is expected to be out for at least 2–3 weeks and will have x– rays today. Roe's injury is not seen as serious.

Minutemen defeat Hawks, lose Camby

• Meyer, others step in for absent sophomore center

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team defeated Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's 74-62 last night at the William D. Mullins Center but lost one of its key players in the process.

With just under nine minutes remaining in the first half, sophomore center Marcus Camby fell to the floor holding the back of his right leg.

After being examined by a doctor, the early assessment was a hamstring injury that is expected to sideline the All- America candidate for at least two to three weeks. Camby will have x-rays today to determine the full extent of the injury. He had two points, five rebounds and two blocked shots prior to the injury.

"It reminded me of the North Carolina game (where Camby suffered sidelining injury last season). I said, 'Here we go again,'" Travieso said. "We knew we just had to do it without him, and for him."

"We have a future lottery pick. If we lose him we're obviously not going to be as good," Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said. "Every guy on the team has to step up a little."

Massachusetts received another scare with just over five minutes to play when Lou Roe had to be helped off the floor with what looked like another injury but turned out to be only a cramp. He is expected to play against George Washington this weekend.

The loss of Camby forced the rest of the Massachusetts frontcourt — already depleted with sophomore Tyrone Weeks sidelined due to illness — to step up its play.

The player that stepped up most noticeably for the Minutemen was seldom-used senior center Jeff

Bernard Blunt still trying to regain pre–injury form

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Where is Bernard Blunt?

A glance at the Atlantic 10 statistical leaders prior to last night's 74–62 St. Joseph's loss saw only one mention of Blunt — eighth in rebounding with 105 rebounds in 17 games (6.20 rpg). One more double–check was done, and no Blunt was found in any other of the A–10 individual leaders.

This is the same Bernard Blunt who terrorized A–10 opponents for three straight seasons, dating back to his Freshman of the Year season during the 1990–91 season. This is the same Blunt who was First–Team All A–10 the next two years. So why isn't Blunt that same Blunt?

On Dec. 1, 1993, in just the third game of the season at Arizona, Blunt was hot, scoring nine points in 12 minutes. Then, shortly after, a freak accident occurred. Blunt's knee cap seemingly broke while in mid–air. Surgical repair on Dec. 3. Out for season, if not more.

In fact, St. Joe's coach John Griffin was worried when he saw Blunt's horrific injury, saying the question was whether he'd ever play basketball again.

Well, Blunt is playing once again. He's got the same 6–foot–3–inch, 210–pound frame, and he still wears his No. 12 jersey. Other than that, the similarities between Blunt pre– injury and now end there.

First, the statistics are down. Blunt, a preseason First– Team All A–10 pick, was averaging 11.1 ppg prior to last night's game, down from his 18.6 career average. He's also shooting at a paltry 32 percent clip, down from his 42 percent career shooting percentage.

And his style is different. Before the knee injury, Blunt was trigger–happy, ready to score on every possession. Now he seems a bit hesitant, a little unsure. Because of the year away from playing basketball. Because of the knee.

"Anytime you take a year away from basketball, it takes a lot to get back into it," Griffin said. "And then the confidence that he has in his leg. He's not sure that sometimes when he goes to the basket that his leg's going to hold up."

Last night, Blunt came out strong. A block on the Minutemen's first possession. Ten points in 15 minutes, going 4–8 from the field. The second half, though, was rather miserable for Blunt. Three points in 16 minutes, shooting 1–7 from the field.

Blunt's statistics and his style represent the beginning of a comeback. The numbers will rise once the confidence in his knee begins to increase. Physically, the knee is in good shape, all things considered.

Mentally, though, the development will take longer. The thought of the knee doing the same as it did on that fateful first day of December in 1993 is normal for any person going through an injury as severe as Blunt's.

"Anytime you have a traumatic injury, it takes a lot of time to come back, it's a lot of difficulty," Griffin said.

Blunt, despite being a notch below his old self on the court, is confident that he will shake the nervousness of the knee, and get back to where he used to be.

New NHL deal will make season interesting to see

Matt Vautour on the NHL

It was worth the wait.

Just when you thought Sega's NHLPA '96 game might be two guys passing proposals across the table to each other...

After surviving a near death experience, the 1994 (not really) –1995 season is going to happen after all.

Here's the deal.

When the two sides met Jan. 12, here is what they came up with for the 1995 campaign:

- A 48–game schedule with no out–of–conference games.
- No all–star game.
- Full Stanley Cup

schedule.

While the format wouldn't be ideal every year, the novelty of it will definitely make for an interesting one–time try.

For hockey junkies everywhere, with the 48 games crammed into three and a half months, and between local games, FOX, ESPN and The Deuce, there will be almost enough televised games to fulfill everyone who has been in withdrawal.

The absence of interconference play will be both good and bad.

The traditional Montreal–Toronto rivalry, which is one of the league's best, will be on hiatus for the season unless they meet in the finals.

Two Central Division teams won't know what time it is. The Detroit Red Wings and Toronto Maple Leafs, who are both in the Eastern time zone, play only two of their games (against each other) all season in their own time zone.

Both teams are potentially Stanley Cup contenders if they can make it through the travel.

However, the lack of interconference play will inspire increased curiosity and interest in the Stanley Cup finals.

Like baseball (remember baseball?), with no common opponents, there really will be no way to predict the winner — which should increase the number of TV viewers.

The limited number of games makes staying healthy even more important. An injury that would normally cause a player to miss only a few games will force him to miss considerably more.

With games played back–to–back, goaltending will be vital to teams' regular season runs.

Dumb trades:

Luc Robataille for Rick Tocchet — Bruce McNall should go to jail for this foolishness alone.

Guy Carbonneau for Jim Montgomery. Ex–Maine star Montgomery is promising but Carbonneau is a proven leader who will solidify St. Louis' defense and penalty killing.

Women set to face West Virginia at Mullins

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts Minutewoman basketball team charges onto the parquet floor tonight to battle the Mountaineers of West Virginia, they will be looking to extend a five–game winning streak and maintain their share of the Atlantic 10's top spot.

Massachusetts, 11–6 overall and winner of 11 of their last 12, also own a 6–1 league mark, good enough for a piece of first place in the A–10, a spot they share with the No. 18 nationally ranked Colonial Women of George Washington. GW is also the only team to defeat the Minutewomen in close to two months.

West Virginia will enter tonight's 7 p.m. match–up in the William D. Mullins Center with a record of 4–11, 1–5 in the A–10. The Mountaineers defeated Temple 71–69 in Morgantown their last time out, a win that snapped a six–game losing streak and gave West Virginia its first conference win of the season.

The Mountaineers are currently in eighth place in the A– 10, just ahead of winless Temple. Their overall 4–11 mark is also the worst start in Mountaineer history.

"West Virginia is a sneaky team," Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "[Coach] Scott [Harrelson] has definitely got some talent down there."

First and foremost on the talent list is Christie Lambert, a freshman guard who has been one of the lone bright spots for West Virginia thus far this season.

Lambert, the current A–10 rookie of the week, has scored in double figures in each of her last 10 games and leads the Mountaineers with 18.1 points per game, including 35 in the win against the Lady Owls. The 5–foot–9–inch guard is also the Mountaineers' leading rebounder, collecting an average of 6.5 boards per game.

Junior Lisa Szymczak, the A–10's leading returning scorer and rebounder from last season, missed six games this season with a knee injury. The forward, who has been plagued by knee injuries throughout her career, has since returned to action for West Virginia averaging 9.8 ppg.

Other leading scorers for the Mountaineers include Talisha Hargis, another freshman who is averaging close to 13 points per contest, and forward Chris McGuire, the Mountaineers' top scoring threat off the bench.

"If you're not ready to go every game, you're not going to win," O'Brien said. "That's what makes our league good. It has really balanced out."

The Minutewomen lead the A–10 in both field goal percentage (46.7 percent) and field goal defense, and their opponents are shooting a paltry 35.7 percent against Massachusetts. This season the Minutewomen are 5–0 at home, including 4–0 at the Curry Hicks Cage and a win in its only contest at the Mullins Center early in the year against Providence.

The Minutewomen will make their home in Mullins for their next three games: tonight's contest, Feb. 6 against Rutgers, who Massachusetts beat for the first time in team history two weeks ago, and Feb. 11 against its A–10 co–leaders, George Washington.

The Mountaineers lead the all–time series with the Minutewomen 18–6. The club is split in their two encounters last season, with Massachusetts defeating the Mountaineers 68–62 in Morgantown, and West Virginia escaping Amherst with a 65–52 win in overtime.

Around the Rim in the A–10:

Rutgers freshman Alicia Sheeler torched Temple by scoring a conference–high 42 points and grabbing 11 rebounds in a 95–71 Lady Knights win in Philadelphia. Sheeler shot an amazing 17–21 (.810) from the floor, and a perfect 7–7 from the foul line. . .

George Washington once again represents the A–10 in the national polls this week, coming in at 18 in both the AP and Coaches' Polls. Colonial Woman sophomore Tajama Abraham is also the current Atlantic 10 Player of the Week. . . The A–10 is home to the nation's two best free throw shooting teams; St. Bonaventure heads the list at 78.5 percent while Massachusetts is second at 75.8 percent. . .

Duquesne's freshman Korie Hlede, who hails from Croatia, is among the country's top ten in both scoring (24 ppg, seventh) and steals (4.3 spg, eighth). . . St Joseph's, always known for its strong defense, is allowing opponents to score an average of only 57 ppg. The Hawks' stingy defense is tied for eighth best in America. . . Danya Smith, Rhode Island's junior, is second in the nation averaging an incredible 9.3 assists per game. . .

West Virginia has struggled since appearing in the 1992 NCAA Tournament, posting a record of 24–46.

UMass football signs 18 new recruits for upcoming season

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Last season before the signing deadline, Head Coach Mike Hodges and the University of Massachusetts football team looked for speed. This season, size and strength on the offensive and defensive lines were the necessities.

Of the 18 players signed before yesterday's deadline for the 1995–96 year, 10 were interior linemen. The average weight of those signed is 278 pounds.

Safe to say UMass got what it wanted.

The Minutemen, who finished 5–6 last season, graduated 12 players, nine of them starters. Those included All– America and Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Year Brian Corcoran (defensive end), YanCon first–team picks Joe Sabella (offensive line) and co–captain Ben Albert (defensive line). Compensation was needed in young talent and Hodges feels Massachusetts did alright.

"I feel great," Hodges said. "We obviously had to have some big guys. Now, I feel we've got a number of guys that can play on the inside."

One of those guys who can play inside is Aaron Parker, a 6–foot–3–inch, 260–pounder who played defensive line at New Brighton High School in Pennsylvania. Hodges said that Parker picked Massachusetts over the likes of Youngstown State and James Madison.

"We feel Aaron has the ability, with continued hard work, to be a differenee–maker in the Yankee Conference," UMass Assistant Coach Ted Roof said.

Two of the signees are from junior college (offensive guard Ron Felice out of Nassau C.C. and wide receiver Jason Leonard from Los Angeles Valley C.C.), while another is a transfer.

Junior tight end Erik Henry, a 6–foot–3–inch, 235–pounder from Cherry Hill, N.J., comes to Massachusetts from Maryland, where he was a starter last season. Henry, who had 11 catches and three touchdowns last year for the Terrapins, still has two years of eligibility remaining.

"Erik is an outstanding athlete who was highly recruited by several Division I–A schools," UMass Assistant Coach Mark Gallagher said. "He should provide immediate help as a tight end."

On the whole, Hodges is pleased with the recruiting class. "We could've really been in trouble — heck, we graduated three senior offensive linemen," Hodges said. "But we did very well."

Hodges confirmed the report in the Jan. 31 issue of the Daily Collegian that defensive line coach Ted Roof will become the new defensive coordinator, filling the position vacated by Jerry Azzinaro, who left for Iowa State.

Different plans debated for student loans' future

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

The U.S. Department of Education is opposing a proposal by congress to abolish "in–school interest subsidy" for subsidized student loans.

If the proposal passes, 4.4 million students will lose subsidized student loans and have to pay up to $5,000 more on a student loan through the loan period, according to Secretary of Education Richard W. Riley. Riley gave his Second Annual State of American Education Address Wednesday.

"This will be the largest reduction of financial aid to working American families in the history of this country," Riley said. "This is the wrong way to go."

The U.S. Department of Education will present its proposed budget for education at a news conference on Monday, according to Tom Lyon, chief of the news branch at the Department of Education.

"The budget will propose to abolish and increase different programs," Lyon said.

Riley, in turn, is promoting President Clinton's Middle Class Bill of Rights, meant to assist working, middle class families who have children in the education system.

Education is the focus of the President Clinton's proposed Middle Class Bill of Rights, according to Riley.

The proposals include a tax deduction for college tuition, increased IRA withdrawals for education, a $2,600–skills grant to benefit working Americans and a $500–child–tax credit, Riley said.

"These proposals are an effort to make sure every American has a chance to be part of the American dream," Riley said.

There are reasons to be optimistic about the future of education, according to Riley.

"The dropout rate has declined in the last decade and the percentage of students attending college is higher than any other developed country," Riley said.

There are still problems, like the Hispanic youth dropout rate, low overall achievement and violence in schools, but there is evidence that the country is dedicated to progress, Riley said.

"America is a nation turning the corner, from a nation at risk to a nation with a future," Riley said.

Recent polls have shown strong support for education from the American people.

Two out of three Americans are not in favor of cuts to federal education programs, according to a The Washington Post/ABC News poll.

A New York Times/CBS poll this December said that 59 percent of those polled oppose cuts in

Repairs started on the New Africa House

■ University begins to act on Black Student Union demands

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

In response to several complaints about the upkeep of New Africa House last semester, University officials took measures over intersession to begin repairs.

New Africa House, which houses the Afro–American Studies department, has been plagued by leaks and alleged asbestos problems; as a result of this neglect, the building was the focus of one of the demands given in November to Chancellor David K. Scott by the Black Student Union.

BSU Vice–president Dan Lizana, whose organization had delivered the ultimatum to Scott following the revelation of the grades of Black athletes by a Springfield Union News reporter, visited the site yesterday.

"I'm happy to see there are changes being made," Lizana said. "I would like to see more changes made because they accommodate the academic atmosphere."

Among the major changes are the renovations to the fourth floor, where rooms both in and out of use previously were poorly maintained by the University. The walls of New Africa House Space Coordinator Penny Cameron's office were blemished by chipped paint and water stains; it has since been wholly repainted, and roofing work on the far right side of the building's exterior was recently completed to prevent further leakage.

"[The administration] has made a definite commitment to fulfilling all demands in regards to New Africa House," Cameron said. "I'm very satisfied with that."

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance space had suffered paint–chipping similar to that of Cameron's, and too was repainted. However, as Cape Verdean brothers Adonis and Sidonio Ferreira pointed out, the furniture in the room remains woefully outdated.

In addition to the principal repairs to the floor, the dusty carpets were shampooed and the overfilled wastebaskets were emptied.

Adonis Ferreira, a graduate student and Graduate Assistant for the Office of Third World Affairs, noticed that janitors had serviced the floor recently, a rare occurrence according to him.

"I've been here for six years," Ferreira said. "The stuff in the trash cans was in the hall for about two years. It's about time."

Room 311, the most heavily utilized classroom in New Africa house, is scheduled to receive new carpeting today; the Shirley Du Bois Library on the second floor was partially recarpeted during winter break.

Yet, several precautions were taken by workers in the removal of the old carpet in room 311 due to concerns over the possible existence of asbestos beneath it. Although it is still not definite that the potentially hazardous substance is present, faculty and staff of New Africa House were prohibited from using the second and third floors during the removal process to ensure their safety; asbestos is most dangerous when airborne.

"The people were asked to evacuate because [the workers] had no idea what they'd find," Professor Esther Terry, whose office is on the third floor, said of the protective measure.

Other minor additions to the building include a handicapped–accessible water fountain (which is currently out–of–order), a new water tank and a help phone (installed late last semester), all on the first floor. During spring break, room 109 and the third floor hallway will be recarpeted as well.

Faculty, staff and students seem genuinely pleased with the progress made in refurbishing New Africa House, although there is still some frustration remaining about the means by which students received compliance from the University.

"I'm happy that all of this got done," Cameron said. "But by the same token I don't want it to be as a result of student pressure the next time. We shouldn't have to resort to such extreme measures."

Lizana echoed Cameron's sentiment, but also offered a different perspective.

"It isn't the job of maintenance to decorate the building or put up paintings," Lizana said, referring to the library's bare walls. "We, meaning faculty and students, have to start treating this building with more importance."

Deregulation could increase local tow fees

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — After the recent enactment of a law restricting government from regulating towing fees, towing companies will be able to freely market their business.

The law, enacted on Jan. 1, de–regulated towing fees and has given local towing companies the leeway to increase fees in the near future.

Illegally–parked cars, towed from Amherst, are now tolling in at $85 a piece. The $85 consists of a $50 tow fee, a $20 storage fee and a $15 ticket fee.

"We're going to go up about $10," said Charlie Thompson, manager of College Street Motors. "It seems like everyone's going up about $10."

According to Thompson, towing organizations statewide have been trying to get this kind of law passed for years.

"There hasn't been a rate increase for 14 years," according to John Jernigan, owner of Amherst Towing.

Jernigan presumes rates will increase slightly, but he is unsure how much, at this point, he said. "There's still a lot of uncovered ground there."

Ren's Mobil Service, located in Amherst, will not be raising their rates, according to Ren Gladu, owner of Ren's Mobil.

"We've been in the towing business for 18 years, doing it as a convenience for our customers," Gladu

UM, district attorney join forces

Survey created to determine knowledge of consumer's rights

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The consumer studies department at the University of Massachusetts and the Northwest District Attorney's Office will be conducting a survey to measure local awareness of consumer's rights.

According to Steve Gary, director of the consumer protection division at the district attorney's office, the survey's goal is to gauge the level of knowledge consumers have about laws that are applicable concerning consumer transactions.

"There are so many laws on the books for consumers," Gary said. "What do consumers really know about them?"

This survey will be sent to approximately 800 to 1,000 people, according to Sheila Mammen, head of consumer studies at UMass.

Consumers will be questioned about such topics as credit history, automobile purchases, warranties, home improvement laws and landlord/tenant relationships, Mammen said.

The survey will be issued to consumers in Hampshire and Franklin counties who have previously contacted the district attorney's office, Mammen said.

The results may be published by the end of the summer and be used by the district attorney's office to develop a community education program, Gary said.

The survey was the result of previous discussions with the department, Gary said.

The questions on the survey do not go into great detail, asking consumers about any specific laws, Mammen said. The survey is styled to get a consumer's general knowledge of consumers' rights.

The questions on the survey are confidential, so all data collected will be credible, according to Mammen.

One sample question asks how long a tenant has to move after given an eviction notice. The person has three multiple choice answers of seven days, 14 days or 30 days to choose from.

The answer is 30 days if the tenant is paying rent, 14 days if the tenant is not.

This may be the first survey of this type done in the area, Mammen said.

"I don't know if it has ever been done," Mammen said.

The consumer studies department plans to use the survey as part of a larger study on consumer knowledge. The department will present its findings at the Annual meeting of the American Council on Consumer Interest and other conferences next year, Mammen said. The results will also be published in academic journals.

Mammen and consumer studies Associate Professor M.I. Alhabeeb will conduct the survey along with Gary.

Clinton: Use words to unify, not to divide

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lamenting that words too often are used to divide and destroy, President Clinton exhorted Americans yesterday to temper their speech and pray that he will, too. "Pray for the president," he urged guests at the National Prayer Breakfast.

In an emotional address, Clinton said the power of words was greater than ever before in the information age, for both good and ill.

"The communications revolution gives words not only the power to lift up and liberate, (but) the power to divide and destroy as never before . . . to darken our spirits and weaken our resolve," he said.

The interfaith gathering brought together nearly 4,000 people representing a cross section of the nation's public life — Republicans and Democrats, governors, judges, diplomats, bureaucrats, foreign leaders and soldiers.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R–Ga., who has often clashed with Clinton, was seated directly in front of the podium from which the president spoke.

Clinton, who has often complained about the harsh political discourse of Washington, urged the crowd to "resolve to clear our heads and our hearts and to use our words more to build up and unify and less to tear down and divide."

"We must work together to tear down barriers," he said. "We must do it with greater civility."

Quoting the Bible, Clinton reminded the crowd of Paul's call to "repay no one evil for evil" and included himself among those who need to heed that counsel.

"There's not a person in this room that hasn't failed in that admonition, including me," he said. "But I'm going to leave here today determined to live more by it."

He called, too, for more humility among public officials and asked the group to keep him in their prayers.

"Pray for the president that he will have the wisdom to change when he is wrong, the courage to stay the course when he is right and some-

Muslim-Croat alliance in danger

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A projected federation of Muslims and Croats in Bosnia is at risk of falling apart as danger of a widcr war haunts the already bloody Balkans, a top State Department official said yesterday.

Due to meet this weekend with Muslim and Croat leaders in Munich, Germany, Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke said Bosnian Serbs likely would cross into Croatia and fight alongside Serbs there in the event of a conflict over a breakaway Croatian Serb enclave.

Croatia has threatened to expel U.N. peacekeepers, but a former U.N. commander in Bosnia predicted the threat would not be carried out.

"The general opinion is that the Croats don't have the military ability to achieve anything significant against the Krajina Serbs," Lt. Gen. Michael Rose said. Krajina is the state proclaimed by Croatia's rebellious Serb minority.

Still, Holbrooke appeared apprehensive about the Balkans and the latest U.S. diplomatic effort, which is designed to salvage the federation formed last March by Bosnian Muslims and Croats. "Negative events on the federation would have a deleterious effect on an already dangerous situation," he said. "We're at a pretty critical time in the situation in the Balkans."

Bosnian Serbs nix joint peace plan

Bosnian Serbs, meanwhile, have paralyzed a plan for peace proposed by the United States, Britain, France, Germany and Russia, by refusing to negotiate with the Muslim-led government on the basis of a map dividing the country into two ethnic zones. One, held jointly by the Muslims and Croats, would control 51 percent of the country. The other, under the Serbs, would cover the remaining 49 percent.

After nearly three years of war, the Serbs hold more than two-thirds of the former Yugoslav republic. They have rejected the map as one that would leave them with economically and politically weak fragments of the country.

With the peace plan stalled, the United States is focusing on the projected Muslim-Croat federation. But 10 months after its creation at a ceremony in Washington, it is in jeopardy, Holbrooke said.

"They're under extreme strain, and the strain is pulling them apart," he said.

The two sides have failed to merge their armies or to implement other joint arrangements. Holbrooke said he would take an "action plan" with him to Munich, where he will be joined by British, French, German and Russian diplomats. Defense Secretary William Perry also will attend the meetings.

"The job is to assist and advise the federation in creating a unified military command out of two armies that recently fought each other but must cooperate on the ground," Holbrooke said. The United States will contribute an unspecified amount of money and ask other countries to do the same, Holbrooke said.

Christopher urges working together

Secretary of State Warren Christopher called on Bosnia's Muslims and Croats, meanwhile, to give "substantive content" to the federation and said the United States intended to help make it work.

"We should work on that together," Christopher said in urging Britain, France, Germany and Russia to give the effort their best. "We're very anxious that that process move forward," he told reporters during a joint news conference with Prime Minister Waldemar Pawlak of Poland.

In related news

The new commander of U.N. forces yesterday toured the most volatile corner of Bosnia, where fighting has vexed international efforts to anchor a month-old, countrywide truce.

Sporadic fighting was reported late Wednesday and early Thursday in Bihac, a northwestern pocket of territory held by Muslims and surrounded by Serbs. U.N. officials reported a massing of tanks, artillery and troops from Serb-held regions of neighboring Croatia in the area.

"We are very concerned by that presence," said U.N. spokesman Paul Risley.

Rebel Serbs in Croatia and renegade Bosnian Muslims, both allies of Bosnian Serb rebels, have been battling Muslim-led Bosnian government troops in the Bihac region. Only the government and Bosnian Serbs signed the four-month truce that took effect with the start of the year.

The presence of Croatian Serbs in the Bihac pocket has "tended to wane and increase from time to time," said Michael Williams, another U.N. spokesman. "There is strong evidence now in the last couple of weeks that it has increased."

He said most of the blame for fighting in the Bihac region lay with Croatian Serbs, who control territory in Croatia that is adjacent to Bihac.

Misinformation concerning nude photos of alumni from both Smith and Mount Holyoke Colleges has left some in the "Happy Valley" blushing.

Public affairs offices at both colleges have been receiving phone calls in response to an article which stated that nude photos taken in the 1950s are being stored in the National Smithsonian Museum of Natural History's archives in Washington, D.C.

The reporter who wrote the New York Times Sunday Magazine's Jan. 15 article made it seem as if two groups of unrelated nude photos were lumped together, according to Stacey Schmeidel, spokesperson for Smith College.

"The Times messed it up," Schmeidel said.

The photos that are stored at the National Museum of Natural History were taken of a small group of volunteer participants in an anthropological research study done in the early 1950s, Schmeidel said.

W.H. Sheldon, a researcher from Columbia University, acquired and used the pictures in a study of the female human figure, according to Kevin McCaffrey, the spokesperson for Mount Holyoke College.

Female volunteers posed nude for photos that were to be used for this study, in which human bodies were to be labeled by "body type," Schmeidel said.

Although the study was never released, the pictures went into the National Anthropological Archives, according to Randall Kramer, director of public affairs at the National Museum of Natural History.

Only anthropologists and scholars who are conducting research projects can gain access to material in the archives, Kramer said.

The other, unrelated group consisted of photos that were taken of students as standard procedure at Ivy League and elite institutions from the 1920s to the 1960s, Schmeidel said.

People thought that one's health could be judged through their posture, Schmeidel said. Students had their photos taken while nude so their posture could be properly assessed, and it could be decided whether they would need special attention given to their health.

By the 1960s, students got to wear leotards or underwear in their photos, Schmeidel said. George W. Bush and Hillary Rodham Clinton are among the many whose pictures were taken for posture purposes.

All of the photos done for these purposes were destroyed shortly after, according to Schmeidel.

"In editing [the Times story], I tried to make it clear that they were two different sets of photos," said Alan Burdick, the editor who edited the story in question.

The museum has given the institutions involved in the research study the option of destroying the photos upon request, Kramer said.

Neither Mount Holyoke nor Smith has requested destruction of the photos of their students.

"We've received a handful of calls from alumni," McCaffrey said. "Some concerned, others mildly amused."

22 Republicans want to force resignation of Brown

WASHINGTON (AP) — Commerce Secretary Ron Brown should be forced to resign because of questions about his personal finances, 22 Republican House members wrote President Clinton on Thursday. The letter, written by Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., told Clinton that Brown's problems "continue to tarnish your administration's image" and his resignation should be demanded "in the best interest of the nation."

The letter cited questions about Brown's business relationship with Democratic Party fund-raiser Nolanda Hill. The lawmakers said their information came from news accounts.

White House spokeswoman Ginny Terzano said, "The president has high confidence in Secretary Brown and the work he has done at the Commerce Department."

Under Brown's stewardship, she said, the department has "helped in our economic stability" because of the outreach he has done with the private sector." Brown, Terzano added, has answered the questions about his finances.

"The letter highlights the extremely partisan nature of the attacks on Secretary Brown," said his attorney Reid Weingarten. "The letter focuses on allegations that were completely investigated (by the Justice Department). He was completely exonerated."

The House members said Brown has stated he invested none of his own money in a company called First International, and that all the firm's major ventures were failures.

said. "It's not the customers' fault that the state has deregulated."

The law was constructed on the notion that a competitive industry is a better regulator of price than the government, according to Tim Shelvin, executive director of the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities.

There will probably be slight increases in towing expenses, but they will be short-lived, Shelvin said. Now that business is not regulated, more people will get involved and the increasing competition should drive rates down.

"Before it used to be $30 to $35 for a tow and $20 for storage. I heard of places charging $100 to $115 immediately after Jan. 1," Shelvin said. "Almost the day after that, I heard of people leasing trucks."

Once the number of trucks increases, people will be forced to lower their prices in order to stay in the competition, Shelvin said.

"The only problem will be having people that are not reputable going out without being properly insured or having the experience," Thompson said.

Everything used to be regulated, and everyone had to have the same insurance, according to Thompson. There is concern for the customers welfare at hand.

In Amherst, it is illegal to park overnight on any town street between Dec. 1 and April 1, according to Captain Charles Scherpa, of the Amherst Police Department.

If a tow truck arrives on the scene, there is a $25 fee, and individuals are charged $40 if the vehicle is hooked up, but not towed, according to Scherpa. An extra $5 gets tagged on to an actual tow if it occurs between 5 p.m. and 8 a.m.

All payments need to be made in cash. If there are any questions, contact Scherpa at 256-4011.

Power plant tears down ash silo for safety reasons

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

For safety reasons, the University of Massachusetts power plant has torn down a structure meant to store ashes produced by the plant.

One of the two ash silos located on the west side of the power plant was removed in late January because it was dysfunctional, said Bill Rose, the associate vice chancellor for administration and finance.

"It was on the verge of falling down," Rose said. "Concrete was crumbling, structural elements were deteriorated. It was taken out of service. Decommissioned."

The two-story silo was in a remote area and unlikely to harm passersby, but it had potential to be hazardous to employees, Rose said.

The Massachusetts Department of Public Safety was routinely inspecting University facilities, including the old steam generation plant, when the ash silo was condemned, according to Dave Beaudin, fire prevention officer for UMass Environmental Health and Safety.

Bill Baker, commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Public Safety, could not be reached at his Boston office for comment.

Henry Geryk, the district engineering supervisor for the Department of Public Safety was the authority who had condemned the ash silo in question about a month ago, Beaudin said.

Neither Geryk nor Ralph Moore, the acting commissioner in Geryk's office, was available for comment.

In the midst of producing energy, the power plant also produces smoke and ashes, Beaudin said.

The ash that is taken from the power plant is used as landfill cover and in road-beds, according to Pat Daly, the physical plant's director of operations.

"It hampers operation," Rose said, referring to the plant now depending on one ash silo. "It is inefficient and difficult. Half as much [power]. We need more truckloads. Now it is more difficult to run the plant."

A contractor in the area removed the ash silo, Beaudin said. He cited the application of a law that requires power plants "to be run by an outside company."

Peter Wozniak, the director of the physical plant, was not surprised by the deterioration and the removal.

"It was very old, and starting to fail," Wozniak said. "[The silo] was close to 40 years old."

Beaudin also said the plant is old and in need of repair, while specifically citing the chimneys that were repaired in the fall of 1994.

Three companies are competing and planning to build a new co-generation plant. Proposals from each company are due by April 7, and the new plant is expected to be in operation by Sept. 1, 1998.

Legislature near passing tough welfare plan

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Legislature is on the verge of passing what may be the toughest welfare program in the country, a plan that would force thousands of poor people to get jobs and would cut off money for able-bodied adults after two years.

The Senate early yesterday morning passed a sweeping welfare overhaul bill, which now will have to be reconciled with another bill passed by the House last week.

Both the House and Senate versions would impose strict new rules on welfare parents, and both would require a significant portion of the state's welfare population to go to work in 60 days, although the bills take different approaches.

After the Senate approved its bill 35-2 on a bipartisan vote, Senate Ways and Means Committee Chairman Thomas Birmingham pronounced it a "more Draconian and punitive version of welfare reform," compared with a bill passed by the Legislature last year and vetoed by Gov. William F. Weld.

"There is a frustration and an impatience with people remaining on welfare seemingly...for indefinite periods of time," said Birmingham, D-Chelsea.

Weld, who has pushed unsuccessfully for a broader work mandate covering all able-bodied adults, indicated Thursday he could accept a scaled back proposal from the Legislature.

"I don't think that's going to be a deal-breaker if you have a real clear work requirement," Weld said.

"There are elements in both the Senate and the House that we like, and if they go together in the right way, I think we'd have a real step forward," he said.

Many elements of the legislative proposals have been initiated in other states. But a variety of reports say no state has attempted as broad an overhaul plan as what looks like will come out of the Massachusetts Legislature.

Changes in the state's welfare program will require approval from the federal government, which helps pay for welfare.

Advocates for welfare recipients, however, see the legislation as a step backward.

"There is no question you can reduce welfare by cutting it off," said Deborah Harris, an attorney with the Massachusetts Law Reform Institute. "It therefore will achieve the stated goal of reducing welfare."

"What it will not do is alleviate poverty or assist children that the (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) program was designed to serve," she said. "If the plan is in fact implemented, then there no doubt will be many children who will suffer."

The Legislature is under a deadline to send a plan to the governor's desk because Weld cut off money for welfare checks after Feb. 10 to push lawmakers to act quickly.

As legislative negotiators try to forge a compromise bill, they will find many similarities between the House and Senate versions. Both, for example, would set a two-year time limit on welfare checks for able-bodied adults, and they would force teen mothers to finish high school and to live with their parents or in a group home to collect benefits.

The bills also would prevent mothers from collecting an extra $90 a month for each additional child they have while on welfare. This provision prompted emotional debate in the Senate, where Senate President William Bulger made a rare speech from the floor, arguing that mothers should at least be given vouchers to buy diapers and other essentials.

Criminals deserve little praise

The sports community in the United States and worldwide is anxiously awaiting his return. Professional boxing has lost its appeal without what they call a true champion in the heavyweight class. The promoters are already setting up plans for his return to the ring.

As soon as he is released, he will be featured in every major publication across the country. People treat his sentence as an irritation, not a severe punishment. He'll earn millions of dollars per fight, and eventually wear the title belt once again.

People will forget, if they haven't already, why he wasn't champ for awhile, why he spent three years in prison. Fans will cheer him on. They will pay good money to watch his return on television. Announcers will constantly remind the viewing audience how much the sport was lacking without good ole' Mike. Maybe someone will remember that he wasn't so good.

Mike Tyson is a rapist, plain and simple. He was convicted of a crime which is plaguing America today. He forced himself on a woman who didn't want him there. He used his fame, his size and his legendary status and thought he could have whatever he wanted. He was wrong.

The media and sports community will make plenty of money with Mike's return. They'll be sure not to remind the public of his past. They'll keep his popularity up for the sake of selling papers. They won't even acknowledge one of the key problems in society today, violence against and the abuse of women. It is the responsibility of the media to present the facts the way they are, not to shift the focus off the real problem.

Pete Rose was banned from baseball because he gambled. The powers in Major League Baseball thought his actions were unethical, and misrepresented the game. Pete Rose still believes he belongs in the Baseball Hall of Fame, but he will forever be a member only of the Hall of Shame.

It's time for the boxing community to follow baseball's lead. Mike Tyson should not have the privilege of being heavyweight champion of the world. He should be banned for life from the ring. Many see him as a tragic result of bad circumstances when he should be seen for what he is, a criminal.

Currently, O.J. Simpson has a media circus surrounding his trial in criminal court. The media has centered all of the attention to the proceedings of O.J.'s trial, not to mention Judge Ito's hair. Once the trial is over, the lingering memories will be about O.J. and his story.

He was a superstar athlete, a nice guy and an actor. Then, he allegedly killed two people. You may deny it, but that's what you will remember, because that's where the media focuses the attention. How will anyone remember O.J. for what he was? The media won't let them. O.J. will still be seen as a Hall of Fame football player. People won't remember the many times he beat his wife and the other times when he stalked her. They all but forgot until he allegedly decided to kill her.

Again, a professional sports organization has a chance to set a precedent. It's time for O.J. to be removed from the Hall of Fame. His commemorative bust and other memorabilia would sell for millions of dollars at a public auction. People everywhere would go crazy for an opportunity to own a piece of the O.J. saga. The huge sum of money which would be raised could be used to bolster centers for battered women across the country.

Men all over the world focus much of their attention on sports and the sports community. Therefore, the sports community can influence and educate their fans. A sports world which will not tolerate actions such as rape and domestic violence could bring attention where it is badly needed.

Violence against women is an epidemic in America today, and the fact that the media and sports community wish to downplay it is disgraceful. Here are two shining examples as to why there is such a problem today, but people don't get a chance to see them clearly because the money-making powers that be refuse to acknowledge that the problem even exists.

For an athlete to be a champion boxer or a hall of fame football player, he must first be a man. Unfortunately, neither of these two can claim to be that. Sure they have their own place in the archives, but that's in the Hall of Shame, right next to Pete.

Family farms are still worth saving

Paying our debt to the family farm.

We've all heard the pleas to "Save the family farm," right? The words have become almost as common as those asking us to help save the rain forest. Do we really understand, though, exactly what we are trying to save?

Would it surprise you to know that the answer is our own lives? Think about it. It is the farmers that are keeping this country alive.

They are the ones who produce all of the food that we consume daily. Whether you are a vegetarian or a steak-and- potatoes sort of person, you are in debt to the farmers of America for your lives.

However, many of the mid-range farms with, say, a thousand head of cattle, are going out of business. The income that they're making isn't enough to leave them with a profit after their expenses.

There must be a good number of people here on campus who come from farms such as these, and who have experienced the lifestyle.
Alexis George

Projects such as the Farm Aid concerts, the seventh of which just occurred, have tried to raise money to help these farmers make up the difference. However, more and more of these farms are still unable to survive.

This has had very little impact on the massive agriculture business of the Midwest, but it has opened the door for the smaller, family farms to succeed. It is these farms, with about a hundred head of cattle or so, and some children to help shoulder the work load, that are on the rise.

It is here in New England, perhaps more than anywhere else in the country, that we encounter these family farms in the greatest number.

There must be a good number of people here on campus who come from farms such as these, and who have experienced the lifestyle. People who realize the value of those farms that we pass daily and take so much for granted.

Those farms where horses are urged on through trail rides, or where they grow fat, but are kept even in the most financially strapped of times, when a horse is a luxury.

Those farms where rows of cows are shipped off to meat markets, or where they are quietly milked at four in the morning and again at dusk.

Those farms where corn fills small fields, or where fields of hay are bailed in the heat of the summer.

Those farmer where lambings take place in the middle of the night, and where sheep are stripped of their wool spring after spring.

Those farms where roosters crow at all hours of the day, and eggs are sold for a dollar a dozen.

Those farms where the slinky barn cats and the dogs that relentlessly chase cars are always part of the family.

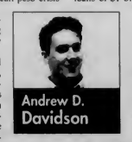
Does this sound like something worth saving?

It does to me.

Alexis George is a UMass student.

Doing the right thing in Mexico

Public opinion is a statistic upon which politicians base their decisions, not unlike the way corporations use market research. It is ironic that the same public who overwhelmingly approved an anti-immigration proposition in California are the same people who oppose American intervention in the Mexican peso crisis by an even larger margin.



It is between this chasm of public opinion where Congress fell last week, wishing to do what was prudent but dancing away from what its constituents did not support.

The peso was taken off the fixed exchange rate of 3.5 per dollar on Dec. 20, 1994 and has been falling ever since, hitting a low 6.55 per dollar. Despite efforts by the Federal Reserve and the Mexican central bank to support the troubled currency, it continued to fall, pointing the spotlight on Washington to devise a solution.

Despite the support from President Bill Clinton, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, Speaker Newt Gingrich, House Minority Leader Richard Gephart, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, and Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, Congress couldn't push through a viable package which would stabilize the currency of our third-largest trading partner.

So Clinton was left with no choice but to enact an executive order that provided $49.8 billion worth of loan guarantees. Congress's inability to deal with the crisis points to its ineffectiveness on matters of foreign policy and economic security. "It shows the importance of presidential leadership," notes Rep. David Drier (R-Calif.).

The plan Clinton actually put together is a masterpiece of foreign policy, underscoring how his ability to compromise and make deals goes a lot further in the international sphere than it does at home.

The president used his authority to tap $20 billion worth of three to 10-year loans from the exchange stabilization fund, which had traditionally been used to stabilize the dollar on foreign currency markets.

But what was more impressive to lawmakers was how he secured $17.8 billion in long-term credits from the International Monetary Fund, a record for the IMF. He also secured $10 billion in short-term credits from the Bank of International Settlements, as well as short-term loans of $1 billion each from Canada and a conglomerate of Latin American nations.

The reason Mexican markets were in such upheaval was that investors were unsure of the government's ability to repay the principle on the bonds which turned over. Therefore, providing short-term loans would be necessary to help the government restore confidence in its government issued bonds. Mexican president Ernesto Zedillo made a brief statement assuring that the credits "assure the nation that its short-term liquidity crisis will be overcome."

Essentially, the plan restores investors' confidence in the Mexican economy, meaning that capital will probably keep flowing into the economy. This provides a further guarantee that the loans would be repaid, thus restoring the value of the peso, and ultimately, the stability of the Mexican economy. "We are simply substituting short-term credit with long-term credit," said Mexican Finance Minister Guillermo Ortiz.

Ultimately, the package Clinton brokered will further hurt his public image. "What you have is a president flouting the will of the American people," says Kevin Phillips, a Republican political analyst.

But measuring public opinion against national interest is not an exact science. Ask most Americans if they want cheap cars and televisions, if they want to keep their export driven jobs for the next few years, and they would unquestionably say yes. The public is not always able to measure the full ramifications of all policies, and the crisis in Mexico is a clear example of that. If the American people truly knew the ramifications of a collapsing Mexican economy, they'd probably think twice about opposing a stabilization plan.

Letters to the Editor

Political leaders shaft University

To the editor:

"It is the curse of our times that the ethic of work, family and faith has become corroded in many communities, both city and suburb," said Gov. William F. Weld in his second inaugural address. He may be right. However, I don't think that it is very useful for a governor to preach at people by telling them how virtuous they used to be. It is more important to stand for the good institutions Americans have created to follow their democratic ideal, things the governor can do something about. Public higher education, for example.

It is the curse of Massachusetts that Weld and his administration do not believe in public higher education (I am giving more to what they do than to what they say). It is the curse of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, a major national research institution, to be constantly threatened and chastised by political leaders who do not recognize what it does well.

Who is to blame? I suppose President Michael K. Hooker has been Weld's teacher in that regard. He must have explained to him that, as far as the state of Massachusetts is concerned, political expediency is short sighted and morally wrong. He must have reminded him of the goals of public research institutions.

He must have emphasized the diversity of their tasks. He must have made him aware that, in comparable institutions, intellectual pursuit is the name of the game all over the world (whether it is politically pleasant or not). He must have told him that the faculty is accountable, but that its work cannot be simply measured in economic or quantitative terms.

There are areas of Weld's and Hooker's work on which I would hesitate to pass judgement (although being fair and well informed about my work does not seem to matter to them).

However, when it comes to this University, it is clear that both Hooker as a teacher and Weld as a student did not perform well. Did Hooker teach a sufficient number of hours? Did he use the right pedagogy? Did Weld really try to understand? Did he travel too much and cut too many classes? Whatever the reason may be, I give both of them a D+.

Film message speaks to all

To the editor:

Regarding John Singleton's Higher Learning, I'm glad to see that it is provoking some though, and some discussion on the pages of the Collegian. However, I wanted to address a few points raised by Caleb Cochran. Certainly, Singleton used simplified or prototypical examples of college students. Given the limitations of commercial cinema, he makes a pretty penetrating critique of how "diversity and multiculturalism" are treated as mere buzz words on campuses across the country.

Cochran seems eager to acknowledge the frightening truth about the rise of neo-fascism in the United States, but what about the other telling stereotypes? Let's not dismiss the implicit critique of the "sensitive new age" guy, who's social concern seems largely motivated by a desire to get closer to the "neo-hippie peacenik" rape victim.

What about her? She doesn't know much about herself at age 17, but then again who does? Her White girlfriends are the real villains for abandoning her at the frat party. We may be tired of the cliche but face it, fraternities and sororities don't always encourage responsible behavior. Often times they celebrate (alcohol/drug) abuse, rape and violence against women, or and otherwise "use and be used" approach to interpersonal relationships. Singleton seems to be saying many White people just don't get it even though they may think that they do.

His most important message comes at the very end of the movie — UNLEARN. Kids who come with different attitudes of entitlement coupled with bigotry and violent hatred, need to unlearn some of what they know. Different backgrounds give us different resources with which to cope, as well as different motivations for learning and possibly trying to affect some change. The skinheads are not the only bad guys and the dumb "blondes" may not be as innocuous as they seem.

I would have liked to see some things developed more fully in this film. For instance, the young woman who was raped found the support she needed only through her friendship with an African American woman and a White lesbian. None of these women are heroes, but the fact is that strong women need each other especially when they can't trust the police or other institutionalized "help" systems.

Ice Cube gave a very savvy portrayal of the "super-duper senior," and the professor played by Laurence Fishburne was also stunning. I think the campus police were rather comic, but also right on target.

Despite its apparent simplicity, this film makes an excellent teaching tool, and I have recommended it to everyone. It shows that growing up and developing your own identity is an inherently political process. It also demonstrates the pitfalls of an identity politics that says "I'm okay, you're okay."

Diversity and multiculturalism are simply facts of life. The real question is how we can learn to respect our differences, despite our differences of opinion. Singleton's message is clear, and it is one we can all take to heart. UNLEARN! Learn with a vengeance, with a sense of purpose, with the certainty that each lesson is important. Perhaps it is not idle hands, but idle minds that are the devil's workshop. Don't be afraid to make a few mistakes. Remember what Frederick Douglas said, "Without struggle there is no progress."

A capella groups to perform in competition

The Harvard Din and Tonics to defend their title against the UMass A Cafellas

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

A big trend in popular music lately has been to focus on vocal talents. And although masked with synth grooves and drum machines, the styles are all derivative of an art that has been recently overlooked — a cappella.

This weekend, however, music lovers can get a taste of some of the finest a cappella talents that New England has to offer.

The Eleventh Annual Silver Chord Bowl, an all a cappella competition, will take place this Sunday, presented by the Northampton Arts Council.

"The kids put on a high quality show," said Mary Kaspcr, a member of the Northampton Arts Council. "The singing is terrific."

Last year's winners, Harvard's Din and Tonics, which has been on several world tours since its conception 16 years ago, will be in attendance to defend its title against six other groups.

"The competition should be pretty good," said Jan Liston of the Din and Tonics. "I think we have a good shot, it will be tough like it was last year."

Yale's Whim 'n Rhythm is an all-female group and although Yale has a rich tradition of singing groups, has been around for 14 years.

Originally a Tony Award–winning comedy troupe, The Tufts Amalgamates switched over to a cappella in 1986 and feature vocal percussion in their performances.

One of the younger groups featured at the competition is Wesleyan College's The New Group, who were founded in 1988.

Last year's winners of the Silver Chord Bowl, the Harvard Din and Tonics.

The New Group experiments with musical styles ranging from jazz to techno.

The Silver Chord Bowl will also feature some talent from the valley, with UMass, Smith and Amherst College all being represented.

The Smith College Smithenpoofs are the only women's group to have ever won the Bowl and will be returning to the competition after a three-year hiatus.

Amherst College will send the Zumbyes, a group who have become favorites of the contest with their quirky sense of humor.

Finally, The A Cafellas, from UMass, are the first group from the University ever to participate in the competition and perform almost entirely their own compositions.

The Silver Chord Bowl will take place at the Academy of Music in Northampton on Sunday, Feb. 5, at 2 p.m.

Tickets are $5 and can be purchased at For The Record, and other Northampton locations.

Basketball book looks at aspects of winning team

IN THESE GIRLS, HOPE IS A MUSCLE
Madeleine Blais
Atlantic Monthly Press

A story of girls' athletics and a basketball championship set in the Pioneer Valley that you don't have to be a sports fan to appreciate comes together in Madeline Blais' new book In These Girls, Hope is a Muscle.

The coach and players clearly trusted Blais with their private lives and feelings and it came through warmly in the book.

Blais, a Pulitzer Prize winner and journalism professor at the University of Massachusetts, tracks the 1992–93 Amherst Regional High School girls basketball team that captured the State Championship.

Local readers will not only enjoy Blais' references to a variety of Pioneer Valley institutions including the Dead Mall, Antonio's Pizza and even the Hobart Hoedown, but also her accurate descriptions of the atmosphere that depicts the Pioneer Valley.

The book's main strength is its character descriptions and how Blais explores the players. In addition to their quotes, Blais uses excerpts from players' diaries, poems and phone conversations.

Blais not only concentrates on the starters but focuses on the reserves' experiences as well. Blais tracks the relationship on and off the court of star guards Jamila Wideman and Jenny Pariseau, whom the other players admired and idolized, and how their chemistry affected the team's overall play.

Even the seldom used reserves' accomplishments, that might easily be overlooked, are included. Blais effectively shows the role personality in an athletes' attitude and ability on the court.

The coach and players clearly trusted Blais with their private lives and feelings and it came through warmly in the book.

Blais admits early on that she is a "sports virgin," who has never played on a team and has a minimal knowledge of sports.

Instead of this fact hindering the book, it greatly enhances it. Many sports books get very technical and get bogged down with numbers and statistics. Blais avoids this trap and sticks to the players, which provides for considerably more entertaining reading.

In These Girls, Hope is a Muscle shows the aspects and elements of a winning team, in such a way that it will transform many readers into fans of a team that no longer exists — which makes the work a winner.

Simple Minds' newest album is stuck in the past.

Simple Minds' latest bad news

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

GOOD NEWS FROM THE NEXT WORLD
Simple Minds
Virgin Records

Remember Simple Minds? Sure you do. Those neo-new wavers that chalked up big hits in the mid-'80s with songs such as "Don't You Forget About Me" (from the ultimate mid-'80s teen-angst flick The Breakfast Club) and "Alive And Kicking." Well guess what? They're baaack. . . .

Yes, they have returned to the music world on a mission and according to the press release that accompanied their latest effort, Good News From The Next World, that mission is to write songs about "trying to keep the faith alive." Well congratulations guys, you have more than accomplished your goal because GNFTNW sounds exactly like the boys never left 1986.

Eternally stuck somewhere between A Flock Of Seagulls and Modern English, Simple Minds still proudly carry on that proud legacy (that was presumed dead after INXS finally lost their popularity) of overproduced, underdeveloped and out and out boring songs that permeated the last decade. Every single song on GNFTNW desperately wants to be some sort of emotion-wrenching anthem, but instead falls flat on its face, thanks to a production job that leaves the mix sounding flat and uninspired.

Case in point, the lead track and first single, "She's A River" is chalk full of synths and watered down guitar playing, that wouldn't sound that out of place in a car commercial. By the time the all female chorus rings in with chants of "she's a river, she's a river" the whole thing just melts down into a sad parody of itself.

Then there is Jim Kerr's vocals. From the get-go it's obvious that Kerr wants to shed his cute-mud-boy image that he previously utilized with great success. Unfortunately, he has traded it for that whole hip, tortured poet thing that has grown extremely old (picture Bono — only ten times more pretentious). With lines like "Can you hear the echoes calling/Speaking in verse/When I hear the lone night music/Everything gets stronger and I lose this curse," it is clear that Kerr wants to be taken seriously, but one look at the fashionable grunge-garb that he's sporting in the picture on the back cover and you know he's going about it the wrong way.

Kerr and his partner Charlie Burchill (the band has been trimmed down to a dynamic duo) do need to take a lesson from their current-day, musical contemporaries, but, presumably unbeknownst to them, not in fashion. Maybe (and I emphasize maybe) if they parred down their songs to the basics and did away with the wash of echo, lackluster drumming and layered keyboards they could be on to something, instead of just treading the same waters they did nine years ago.

Good News From The New World is so derivative and so uninteresting that one would almost want to give Simple Minds the benefit of the doubt and say that they are trying to make a statement by spitting in the eye of the current low-budget, low-fi, music trends. But alas, that would probably be giving them too much credit. Simple Minds are just a sad of example of how shallow the music world can be — posers who don't even have enough ingenuity to at least make a half-hearted attempt at faking it. F

Parish shines in return to the Garden

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Even though Robert Parish is playing a lesser role with Charlotte than he did during 13 years with the Celtics, his contributions are still appreciated.

Parish came off the bench with eight points and 12 rebounds Wednesday night to help the Hornets beat Boston 100-93. It was the Chief's last game in Boston Garden, and the Celtics fans cheered his every move.

"I feel an awakening from the crowd," Parish said. "Sometimes I miss this place. This is where my career took off, and I have a lot of fond memories."

The Boston fans aren't the only ones who love Parish. Charlotte coach Allan Bristow said bringing the 41-year-old center off the bench allows Alonzo Mourning to play power forward and Larry Johnson to move to small forward.

That worked well Wednesday night, with Johnson scoring 28 points and Mourning adding 17 points and 12 rebounds.

"Robert has had a tremendous impact on our team," Mourning said. "He added so much depth to our front line. As the season progresses, we'll see how valuable he is."

Parish played only 21 minutes, but his 12 rebounds were a season-high.

"We do that a lot this year, giving up season highs," Celtics coach Chris Ford said. "It's only fitting that Chief should get one in his final game here."

Charlotte had a 17-point lead late in the third quarter, but made only three of 12 field goal attempts in the fourth. Boston fared only slightly better, shooting 35 percent.

Rookie center Eric Montross had 24 points and 10 rebounds for Boston and Dino Radja, coming off a hip injury, finished with 25 points and nine rebounds while trying to control Johnson.

"Dino's a big guy and he's pretty quick, and you'd like to have him take his man one-on-one," Montross said. "But Larry's a great player and there's no way you can stop a great player in this league by yourself."

Charlotte led 90-76 with 10:16 to go before going scoreless for the next 4:12. Boston scored seven consecutive points before Muggsy Bogues' jumper with 6:04 left made it 92-83. The Celtics cut it to 95-90 before the rally fizzled.

"We made it a game at the end, but I wasn't satisfied with the effort for 48 minutes," Ford said. "We had an awful lot of chances at the end. We had our opportunities to decrease the lead but we forced bad shots."

The Central Division-leading Hornets have won seven of eight games overall as well as seven of eight against Boston. The Celtics have lost seven of eight.

Boston's lone recent victory came Friday, when Ford benched most of his starters — including co-captains Dee Brown and Dominique Wilkins — and the resulting lineup responded with a 117-91 victory over Golden State.

Rookie Greg Minor, coming off a college and pro career-high 31 points in that victory, didn't score against Boston. The Celtics have lost seven of eight.

Wilkins, who has drawn the bulk of the fans' ire for the Celtics' problems, was cheered when he came off the bench Wednesday and responded with 10 points.

"They got me going, especially early in the game," said Wilkins, who declined to speculate whether he would return to the starting lineup. "I felt, like, 'OK, it's time to play now.'"

Shell fired by LA Raiders

By John Nadel
Associated Press

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. — Art Shell was owner Al Davis' kind of player and coach: He was loyal, dedicated and had a burning desire to just win, baby.

Shell didn't win and was fired on Thursday after a 27-year career as a player and coach for Davis, who agonized for weeks before making his decision.

Mike White, a Raiders' assistant since 1990, was hired to replace Shell, a Hall of Fame player who became the first black coach in pro football's modern era.

"The Raiders expressed gratitude and sincere thanks to Art Shell for his tremendous contribution to the excellence of the organization throughout his 27 years as a Hall of Fame offensive tackle, as an assistant coach and as the head coach," said a Raiders' news release confirming what has been speculated for weeks.

The Raiders held a 4 p.m. EST news conference with Davis and White scheduled to be present.

The 48-year-old Shell took over for Mike Shanahan after four games of the 1989 season. His firing left Minnesota's Dennis Green as the only black head coach in the NFL.

Shell reportedly was offered another job with the team, but may be considering a coaching job elsewhere. He was in a meeting at the Raiders' headquarters Thursday morning, a team spokesman said, and did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

Shell's dismissal was anticipated when the Raiders failed to make the playoffs and finished 9-7 after being picked as a preseason favorite to reach the Super Bowl. They lost to Kansas City 19-9 at the Coliseum on the last day of the regular season. In Shell's first four years as coach, the team made steady improvement to become a strong playoff contender, particularly in the last two years.

But the Raiders' promise faltered in postseason losses to Buffalo following the 1990 and 1993 seasons, and a loss to Kansas City in the playoffs after the 1991 season.

The 58-year-old White joined the Raiders as an assistant in 1990 to work with Jay Schroeder. He was later re-assigned to coach the offensive line — a trouble spot for the Raiders in recent seasons because of injuries, penalties and weak pass protection.

White, a former coach at California and Illinois, was offensive line coach the past two years. His elevation goes with a Raider pattern of looking for leadership within their ranks.

Previous head coaches with Raider experience included John Madden and Tom Flores. But that was interrupted when Shanahan was hired in 1988 and spent a stormy 1 1/2 years with the Raiders before being replaced by Shell.

Since then, Shanahan returned to coaching as an assistant at Denver until moving to San Francisco as offensive coordinator. After the 49ers' Super Bowl win Sunday, he was hired to coach the Broncos.

Shell, 56-41 with the Raiders, became the seventh NFL coach to leave since the '94 season began.

Asked Wednesday what he would do if fired, Shell told the Los Angeles Times: "If and when the time comes, I'll address that." A source cited by the Times said there have been exploratory talks with the Miami Dolphins about Shell becoming an assistant with Don Shula.

Shell played for the Raiders in Oakland and Los Angeles 1968-82 as an offensive tackle, and was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1989. He became an assistant coach with the team in 1983.

The other coaches released were Jack Pardee (Houston), Wade Phillips (Denver), Rich Kotite (Philadelphia), Chuck Knox (Rams), Pete Carroll (New York Jets) and Tom Flores (Seattle).

"He really came out of nowhere," said alumnus Norm Smith. "He really impressed everybody during the interview process."

• The New Jersey Nets are talking about changing their mascot to the Fire Dragons. There are people throughout the sports world criticizing the idea.

Why?

The Nets is one of the most uninspired, nicknames ever, and the Fire Dragons is a step in the right direction. It would help the organization's otherwise anemic marketing as well. Good for them.

Some other teams should follow its lead.

Uniforms in general are getting pretty hideous. The Cleveland Cavaliers (and many others) are wearing uniforms that even Doc Severinson wouldn't wear, while other uniforms are ridiculously boring. Most obvious is the Cleveland Browns. This nickname makes the Nets appear like a creative masterpiece.

This team should make the obvious switch to the Bull Dogs, in keeping with their "dawg pound" fan club, because as of right now, the symbol is ugly and a marketing disaster.

Layoff the Nets for showing some creativity; there are many much better reasons to criticize them that.

• When the Boston Garden gets torn down, the home team's penalty box is being given to Terry O'Reilly for his frequent visits there.

Rumor has it that UMass freshman defenseman Brad Norton, who holds the single season record for penalty minutes in his rookie campaign, has put in a preliminary request for the Mullins box. . .

• It's time to either take down or change the MVP pictures that are hanging in Boyden. None of the depicted athletes still attend UMass. Note.

easier each night by a defensive corps Parker terms the best he has ever coached. Recent BU blueliners Scott Lachance and Peter Ahola have enjoyed NHL success, and Quebec first round draft choice Jeff Kealty (22nd overall–1994) could be next.

If only Kealty could get into a BU game. He has been scratched from several contests while waiting patiently behind BU's veteran defense, led by HE All-Conference choices Rich Brennan and Kaj Linna. Brennan did not play in the first two meetings and has missed the last six games because of an injured right knee but may play tonight. Chris Kelleher, a member of the USA World Junior Championship squad, lends further depth.

BU is not, and never has been particularly shabby up front, but the heart of BU's offense has not been HE First Team center Jacques Joubert. Joubert has been productive, but Mike Grier has been explosive. Grier and his swift teammates torched UMass on the Olympic-sized ice at Mullins, as the conference scoring leader (17 goals) collected two goals, one of his seven multiple scoring games this season.

"They're loaded [15 NHL draft picks]," Mallen said. "Grier's having a phenomenal year.

"We have to try to get on their defensemen, and we've also got to make sure we've got enough guys coming back [on defense]. Now that it's February, we're trying to play our best hockey, and that means better team defense."

The additions of Dale Hooper and Brian Corcoran have strengthened UMass' defense, and Corcoran's big checking game could go a long way toward containing BU's flying forwards.

BU transfer Jon Jacques was also ineligible for the first two contests, which explains his excitement over tonight's clash.

"It's another great opportunity for us to establish ourselves," Jacques said. "The main thing is to just leave [the Holy Cross game] behind us and focus on [tonight]."

Hopping the border: Along with Kealty, BU's Brennan, Chris Drury and Billy Pierce are property of the Nordiques.

"I really like the campus. [Being from] Texas, I'd never seen the North before and I liked it," Thompson said. "I really liked [the players]. I knew four of them already [Erin Lynch, Rebecca Myers, Danielle Dion and Julie Magid] and then I met the rest. They were all really nice."

Both are unsure of what Rudy's plans are for them but they are eager to play for him and UMass.

"I don't really know what his plans are for me but whatever he wants me to do I'll do it," Johnson said. "Whatever my role is, I'll do it. [But] I think I'll definitely be playing forward."

"I heard that Coach Rudy likes to develop players and I really want to develop more," Thompson said. "When I went up there on my visit, I saw that the team was serious in trying to make it to the Final Four. When I get there, I would like to make it to the Final Four."

The Minutewomen made it to the Final Four in 1993 where they lost to eventual National Champion North Carolina to end their season at 17-3-3.

Calipari also pointed to the game's early start as a factor that would work against the Minutemen.

"It's hard to play at noon," he said. "Only players who are really into it play well in noon games."

"It's all psychological," Rue said. "You get up and have breakfast, and after breakfast you're a little sleepy. They'll wake us up and we'll step up for the challenge."

Hamstring injury sidelines Camby

Marcus Camby, sophomore center for Massachusetts, suffered a strained left hamstring during Wednesday night's 74-62 win over St. Joseph's. Camby will sit out approximately three weeks, according to team trainer Ron Laham.

"Marcus is doing fine and he understands that the injury will keep him out for a few weeks, but that he will be able to return after it is fully healed," Laham said.

With just under nine minutes remaining in the first half, the Hartford, Conn. native was running up the court before he fell to the floor, clutching the back of his left leg. Camby received immediate treatment which consisted of ice, compression and crutches.

He was then re-evaluated yesterday morning by team physician William Lohrer, who diagnosed the injury as a second degree strain (with first degree being the least severe and third degree being the worst).

Without Camby in the middle, Minutemen coach John Calipari said that, "...by losing him, we're not as good. Every guy will have to step it up a little."

Camby missed time as a freshman last season when he strained a ligament in his knee, an injury which sidelined him for about seven weeks.

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19) You cannot expect to please everyone all of the time. Encourage adult offspring to handle their own problems. Surface appearances can be deceiving.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You may be confused about what you really want from a relationship. Talk to someone who has your best interests at heart. If you record your thoughts in a journal, keep it locked away.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Keep plugging away and you will land lucrative new clients. Domestic affairs capture your attention later today. Make each of your offspring feel important. Inexpensive home repairs should be taken care of right away.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Tie up any loose ends before making a permanent move. You need to be certain that your facts and financial figures are correct. Consult the right specialist. A loan will be approved if you ask.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Plan ahead of time. Now you will handle difficult situations or people. Practice an hour at the mirror. Give your mate more credit for common sense. Delays are likely when traveling.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Your creative juices are really flowing now! Aim for loftier goals. Perseverance will turn your dreams into reality. Handle your money with care. Setting some aside for a rainy day. Postpone signing long- term contracts.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) A conservative financial approach is essential. Say "no" to big purchases. Wait for the sales. Trust your heart on the love front. Your instincts are right on target. Attend a group gathering this evening.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Put selfish interests on hold and lend a helping hand. Learn from an older person's experiences. Self-discipline and hard work will help you master the grade. Refuse to become loved one's emotional doormat.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Bold ideas will catalyze you into action! Organize your desk, files and book shelves. "Armchair athletes" should focus on getting in shape. Turn off the television and get some exercise. A daily walk will help.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) The print could bring good news. Bookkeeping chores require prompt attention. Pay bills on time. Taking a calculated risk or two will help you move to a higher financial plateau. Keep detailed records.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Visualize the future and what you hope to be doing. Your skill at solving riddles makes you eager to explore the unknown. Loved ones are supportive. Look for new outlets for your special talents.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Act confident if you encounter obstacles along the employment path. Piercing all of your ears! Another person could be a mistake. Love is a powerful force in everything you do today. Overlook your partner's foibles.

Minutemen set to take on Koul, Colonials

With Marcus Camby sidelined, Calipari forced to juggle Massachusetts' lineup

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

It was supposed to be a battle of two of the Atlantic 10's premiere big men.

George Washington would pit its 7-foot-1 freshman giant Alexander Koul against Massachusetts' 6-foot-11 athletic shot blocker Marcus Camby. But with 8:56 remaining in the first half of UMass' 74-62 win over St. Joseph's, Camby hit the deck, grabbing his leg. The sophomore All-America candidate suffered a strained hamstring.

Camby was examined yesterday by team physician William Lohrer, who diagnosed the injury as a second degree sprain that will sideline him for the three weeks.

After center Yinka Dare left for the NBA last spring, following his sophomore season, a reporter asked GW coach Mike Jarvis how he would adjust to not being able to design his offense around a dominant big man. Jarvis responded with a chuckle, "What makes you think I'm not?"

The chuckle was Koul. The native of Borovka, Belarus has been solid in his rookie campaign, already earning the conference's Rookie of the Week honors several times. With Dare a frequent DNP with the New Jersey Nets, Koul has flourished in the nation's capital, averaging 12 points, while his six rebounds per game leads the Colonials. He recently scored 22 and added 10 rebounds in a losing battle against West Virginia.

Camby's absence leaves the Minutemen searching for the best option of how to attack Koul and George Washington.

One option for UMass will be more playing time for 7- foot-2 senior center Jeff Meyer, who chipped in a solid six- point, five-rebound, three-block effort against the Hawks Wednesday night.

The Colonials will be familiar with Meyer, as the Wisconsin native seems to turn in his best performances against GW's talented big men — Dare was often frustrated by him.

"I'm going to take what I can get," Meyer said. "Alexander Koul is a seven-footer. I love to play against seven-footers."

The Minutemen will have more than Koul to worry about. UMass was upset by the Colonials a year ago in front of a packed house at the Smith Center.

Senior Kwame Evans leads the A-10 with a scoring average of 20.8 points per game, while Minuteman killer Nimbo Hammons is averaging 12.9 ppg.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari was unsure what lineup would be on the floor at the tip-off against George Washington.

"I may start Jeff. I may start Inus [Norville]," Calipari said. "I may start Dana and Donta."

The Minutemen enter the game with the nation's longest winning streak at 16 games, but Calipari acknowledges that without his sophomore center the streak may be in jeopardy on Saturday.

"Without [Camby], it will be very hard to win," he said. "Everybody has got to really step up."

"It's going to be a tough game," said senior forward Lou Roe. "There will be no boys on the court on

Upsets are a tradition at UM now

Upsets 101.

With two minutes remaining, the bench started to celebrate, and the crowd began a standing ovation. The University of Massachusetts' second-year hockey team was on its way to achieving the unthinkable. In front of the largest hockey crowd (6,834) ever in the William D. Mullins Center the Minutemen toppled No. 1 Maine, 4-2.

The win is easily the biggest win in the history of the hockey program and possible the biggest upset ever in collegiate ice hockey. . .

However at UMass, while the win is certainly celebrated, beating the best has become common place. UMass fans expect to beat No. 1 teams and they have reason to think so. It started in November 1993. In the Preseason National Invitational Tournament, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team shocked the college basketball world by upsetting defending National Champion North Carolina 91-86 in double overtime at Madison Square Garden.

Around the Horn
MATT VAUTOUR

Since that game, knocking the No. 1 team off the top of the mountain has become tradition at UMass.

North Carolina was again the victim last October. The undefeated top ranked Lady Tar Heel and Minutewomen field hockey teams faced off at Westfield State.

After a scoreless regulation, sophomore Kyle Rothenberger drove a shot past the Carolina goalie to give UMass a 1-0 win.

The men's hoop team repeated its actions of the year before this November. Unlike the UNC game, it didn't take the Minutemen two overtimes to dispose of Arkansas. The Minutemen completely dismantled the preseason No. 1, defending National Champions 104-80.

When perennial powerhouse Syracuse comes to UMass, the Orangemen could potentially be No. 1, and the Gorillas have a chance to be the fourth team to knock of a top squad.

• Just how highly rated was that Maine squad. Even after the loss, the Black Bears still sit atop the college hockey poll.

• Cheers to the men's lacrosse team for dedicating its season to the late Dick Garber. He made the program what it is and deserves the honor.

Members of the search commitee that chose Greg Canella as the youngest head coach in Division I lacrosse had some high praise for their new coach.

Carroll cruises to career night in blowout victory

Sophomore forward tallies 28 points in win over West Virginia

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Led by sophomore forward Crystal Carroll's career-high 28 points and game-high tying eight rebounds, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team disposed of the West Virginia Lady Mountaineers, 89-64, last night in the William D. Mullins Center.

West Virginia	64
Massachusetts	89

The 89 points scored by the Minutewomen is the highest point total since the 1980-81 season when UMass defeated Maine, 97-62 (Jan. 24, 1981).

Carroll, whose previous high in points was 23 set against Rhode Island on Feb. 5, 1994, got most of her points off assists from junior Tricia Hopson, who finished with seven.

"Everything's just falling into place," Carroll said. "Working with Jill [Rooney, assistant coach] and just listening to everything she says, I finally have the confidence in myself that I can do it [play well]."

The high-low tandem of Hopson and Carroll got together more than once in spectacular fashion. In one 28-second span, the two connected twice. With the score tied at 13, Hopson made a great pass to Carroll underneath, who put it in off the glass and then led a fast break where she found Carroll once again for two.

"Trish will look to pass before she'll shoot any day and if you run with her, you're getting the ball," Carroll said.

"She [Carroll] was just running the floor better than she's ever run it. She was incredible," Hopson said. "Every time she got the ball, it was like, it was going in. It was really nice to see that because she's a real good player."

Almost four minutes later the two hooked up again when Hopson found Carroll open underneath from out of bounds, making it 24-17. With 2:32 left in the first half, the tandem connected for the final time of the half when Hopson dished the rock underneath to Carroll, making it 29-21.

"Obviously, Crystal came out and played excellent. She just did everything we asked her to do and then some," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Trish Hopson played the best game she's ever played. She was so much under control, made nice passes, made nice decisons, did a good job on defense with things. I think that alone is what carried us.

"For her to have seven assists and one turnover is just excellent. I couldn't of asked for a better performance from her."

The lead increased to 10 when Hopson stole the ball and took it the length of the court, did a 180-degree turn while dribbling, and scored on a fancy layup with 2:05 remaining.

Beth Kuzmeski closed out the half with a trey to put the Minutewomen up 15, 36-21.

UMass went on a 12-2 run to open up the second half, led by Carroll, who scored eight of the 12 points.

The Minutewomen obtained their biggest lead of the game (26 points) when Octavia Thomas made two quick steals that resulted in points in a matter of 19 seconds. Thomas led the fast break on both steals, missing the first layup but finishing her second to make the score 56-30 with 13:10 left. Thomas finished with a game-high four steals.

From that point the Mountaineers went on a 9-0 run, cutting the lead to 17, the closest they would get for the rest of the game.

Since Hopson has been inserted into the starting lineup, the Minutewomen have lost only once (George Washington) and have been playing extremely well.

"I just try to go out there and do my best, whatever happens, happens," Hopson said. "I definitely feel confident going out on the floor. I just try to do my best and help [the starters] out because I know they can score. And if I can just get them the ball, they're going to score and that just leads to wins."

The Minutewomen dominated the boards, holding a 44-28 advantage. The Mountaineers were hurt by the fact that one of their leaders, Lisa Szymczak, was hobbled by two knee injuries that severly slowed her down. Szymczak finished with only eight points and was not a factor in the paint.

Freshman Tez Kraft had one of her best games as a collegiate, scoring a career-high 13 points and providing a spark off the bench.

Three other Minutewomen scored in double figures on the night. Thomas had 15, Melissa Durlin, had 12 and Kuzmeski (two treys) had 10. Carroll shot 11-16 from the field and 6-6 from the line while also notching a steal. Nicole Carter finished with five points and five rebounds in just 13 minutes of play.

Minutewomen ink new recruits for 1995 season

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team has received verbal commitments from two top recruits.

Amanda Thompson, a defender from Texas and Karin Johnson, a forward from Sutton, have both verbally committed to Massachusetts and will officially sign on Feb. 6 to play for Coach Jim Rudy.

Thompson could come right in and fill the void that will be left by the graduation of All-American Heidi Kocher, while Johnson could see some time upfront with Melissa Mitchell graduating.

Thompson, who played for the highly regarded Klein Challenge Under 19 team under coach Bob Lyons, was also recruited by the University of Florida, the University of Georgia and Southern Methodist University, before deciding to come to Massachusetts.

Johnson had thoughts of going to Michigan, but UMass was always the No. 1 school on her list.

"I always wanted to go to UMass," Johnson said. "I've always been a fan. A lot of my family went to UMass. I love it."

Johnson scored 24 goals and had 10 assists this year leading her team to the Central Massachusetts Tournament. She started at Sutton for five years, beginning her career as an eighth grader. In her five years, Sutton won five Central Mass tournaments and were three-time state champions.

"She's a good, talented player," said Ann Licopoli, Johnson's coach at Sutton. "She's very fast, knows the game really well and moves the ball well. I think each year [at UMass] she'll get better. She's not reached the top of her play yet."

Both Thompson and Johnson said they are excited about coming to UMass.

"On my official visit, I met everybody and I liked everybody," Johnson said. "That was another major reason

If the University of Massachusetts hockey team is going to win back-to-back games this weekend for the first time all season, it must defeat two of Hockey East's three nationally ranked teams— No. 4 Boston University tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center and No. 7 New Hampshire Sunday.

UMass played the role of David to perfection last Saturday, foiling the conference's other national power, No. 1 Maine, but suffered a serious setback Tuesday at Holy Cross, an ordinary Division III foe.

"Hockey is a strange game," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "You see what happened Saturday night, then you see what happened Tuesday night. It was a mistake on our guys' part not to be 100 percent ready for Holy Cross, and they paid the price for it."

Two of UMass' high profile forwards — top-liners Rob Bonneau and Tom Perry — did not dress Tuesday, but will play tonight.

"To have a national championship team, you need to have three or four lines as good as that one [Perry-Bonneau- Manganaro], and that's what we're working toward here," Mallen said.

Bonneau sat due to Mallen's team policy of one game "suspensions" for receiving a misconduct, which Bonneau did after mixing it up with Maine's Brad Purdie late in Saturday's upset, while Perry was battling minor injuries. The Crusaders utilized a 40-save effort from Holyoke's Kevin Broderick against a weakened Minuteman attack to hang a 3-2 overtime loss on the visitors.

Goaltending should again be a central point this evening in the third meeting of the season between the two teams. UMass could not solve tonight's starter and All-America candidate Derek Herlofsky Nov. 18 at the Mullins Center in a 7-0 debacle, but Dave Kilduff made a then-Hockey East record 50 saves.

The league's two best freshman goalies, UMass' Brian Regan and BU's Tom Noble, dueled in a 7-4 triumph by the Terriers the following night at Walter Brown Arena.

While the performance gap between Regan and Kilduff appears to be widening, Regan has not secured his grip on No. 1 netminding duties but will get the call tonight. Regan broke Kilduff's mark with 51 stops on the Black Bears, but Merrimack's Eric Thibault set the new conference standard with 54 saves against BU.

BU Coach Jack Parker espouses the same personnel deployment plan as Maine Coach Shawn Walsh, building from the net out. Herlofsky's job is made

Companies gear for peso plunge

By Jeffery Hoffman
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Despite President Clinton's aid package to Mexico, U.S. companies are bracing for a year of plunging sales and uncertainty over investments there.

The announcement of nearly $50 billion in credits from the United States and international lending agencies sparked strong rallies last week in the Mexican stock and bond markets as investors anticipated an end to the crisis touched off by the Dec. 20 devaluation of the peso.

Signs of rising confidence helped the peso recover from its six-week plunge. It took 5.2 pesos to buy $1 Friday, stronger than its 6.3-per-dollar nadir but 34 percent weaker than pre-devaluation levels.

For American companies with big investments and sales in Mexico the news came as a relief - but much as one welcomes the end of a war.

Surveying the damage, they're anticipating a difficult 1995 that will contrast markedly to 1994, when U.S. exports to Mexico surged to an estimated $50 billion — a record — with the implementation of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Sales of U.S. goods ranging from Ford cars to Marlboro cigarettes are projected to drop sharply, and that could mean fewer export-linked U.S. jobs.

Mexico was one of America's biggest customers last year as it binged on imports. Now it faces a period of prolonged belt-tightening to shrink its high trade deficit, and could fall into a recession.

Moreover, even if the peso stabilizes at current exchange rates, imported goods and services will cost Mexicans far more than last year, even as they struggle with stagnant or falling incomes and higher inflation.

The WEFA group, an economic research firm in Bala Cynwyd, Pa., says U.S. exports to Mexico could fall to $27.7 billion in 1995, 50 percent lower than had been projected before the peso's plunge. That could knock up to one-half a percentage point off America's economic growth this year, the group says.

The sharpest declines are expected in consumer products, notably autos, although sales of industrial goods also will fall. Mexican manufacturers buy 70 percent of their materials from the United States.

Still, that doesn't mean American businesses are about to yank carefully planted stakes in Mexico and relinquish what remains a promising market.

"The long-term picture for Mexico remains bright," said David P. Hirschmann, director of Latin American affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington. "Five years from now this will be seen as a jolt in the road. That's what companies are basing their plans on."

The peso's depreciation could, in fact, benefit some firms. The same exchange-rate dynamic that drives up the cost of imports in Mexico brings down the dollar cost of Mexican-produced goods. Those manufacturing in Mexico will find their goods more competitive on export markets.

And if the Mexican government can quickly stabilize its economy and avoid a surge in inflation and wages, makers of labor-intensive goods, like clothing, should enjoy a sharp reduction in their biggest single cost.

Three new rights given; domestic partners benefit

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

In an open letter to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst campus community, Chancellor David K. Scott announced the extension of three additional benefits to domestic partners of UMass undergraduate and graduate students and employees.

Under the plan in action last year, domestic partners were able to receive family plan benefits similar to those available to spouses. For students covered by the Graduate Employee Organization contract, the University assumes a percentage of the cost.

In the letter, released Nov. 30, 1994, Scott outlines three benefits that have been extended to domestic partners. Prior to this policy change, these benefits were only available to heterosexual spouses linked to undergraduate or graduate students and employees by marriage.

Three new benefits available

Two of the benefits apply to the use of University athletic facilities. Under the new plan, the domestic partner of an employee or student may use the athletic facilities provided that the student or employee has paid an additional fee ($20).

A second policy change affects points earned by the domestic partner of an employee under the terms of the Athletic Department's priority point system. Beginning this spring, any points earned by the domestic partner will be computed in the employee's point total. The point total will be used for determining basketball and ice hockey seating in the William D. Mullins Center.

A third additional benefit extends the use of the University Child Care system to the children of the domestic partners of employees and students.

Registration and definition

According to Scott's letter, the University defines a domestic partnership as "two persons of the same gender who certify that they are involved in a relationship of mutual support, caring, and commitment."

Individuals in a domestic partnership must live together and be responsible for each other's basic living expenses. Domestic partners may not be related by blood in a way that would bar marriage in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and they must both be over the age of 18.

This definition and elements of the new benefits plan are based on recommendations by the Domestic Partner Benefits Subcommittee of the Chancellor's Task Force on Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Matters.

To be eligible for benefits, students and employees must register their domestic partnerships with the University. Undergraduate students may obtain the proper form from the Dean of Students' Office, while graduate students can pick it up at the Graduate Registrar's Office. Non-student employees will find the form in the Human Resources Office.

Former student killed in DWI; Band mourns

A former University of Massachusetts student died last week after being hit by an alleged drunk driver in Newburyport, Mass.

Joseph Liguori, 18, of Byfield, was broadsided by Bernard J. Dube, 52, of Amesbury on Feb. 1 at approximately 1:30 a.m., said Chief Roger Merry of the Newbury Police Department.

According to Merry, Dube was driving his late-model pick-up truck north on Route 1 when he crossed into the southbound lane, and smashed into the side of Liguori's Volvo station-wagon.

"[Liguori] was wearing his seat belt and the air bag deployed, but the impact was on the side," said Merry. "It appears he died instantly."

Dube is being charged with driving while intoxicated, and vehicular homicide, Merry said.

Police said Dube was being sought by Wenham police for rear-ending another car and then leaving the scene earlier that night.

"When he hit the other guy's car, [Dube] dropped his front license plate," Merry said. "The police traced it to his truck."

Police said Dube had no prior record of drinking and driving, only a speeding ticket in 1986.

Dube was airlifted to Boston City Hospital where he was originally in critical condition, but is now listed as guarded, Merry said.

According the Registrar's office, Liguori was enrolled last semester as a freshman in the College of Arts and

Muslim students celebrate Ramadan

■ Muslim Student Association celebrates the 'Night of Power'

Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

More than 100 Muslim students at the University of Massachusetts are now less than one week into a month-long fast called Ramadan.

Ramadan, a holiday commemorating Lailatul Qadr, or "The Night of Power," lasts for about a month, according to Irfan Khan, a sophomore electrical engineering major from Pakistan and the president of the UMass Muslim Student Association.

"It's not only about abstaining from food or drink," Khan said. "You're more conscious and aware of what you're doing. It's about self-control. It's a constant reminder for us to carry out our duties to Allah." Allah is the Muslim name for God.

The month consists of daily fasts which last about 12 hours — until sunset, and will continue until the lunar cycle is repeated when the crescent moon reappears, according to Murtaza Mandli, a senior psychology major from Pakistan and former secretary of the Muslim Student Association.

With the sighting of the crescent moon last Tuesday night, the fasting began upon sunrise Wednesday morning, Mandli said.

"It's not only about abstaining from food or drink," Khan said. "You're more conscious and aware of what you're doing. It's about self-control. It's a constant reminder for us to carry out our duties to Allah."

The holiday is a Muslim celebration of the revelations made to the Prophet Muhammad from God, or Allah's, angel Gabriel.

Gabriel acted as a liaison in conveying what became the text of the Quran to the Prophet Muhammad, Khan said.

The Quran is the sacred book of Muslims, and the foundation of the Islamic faith.

"God was giving messages to the archangel Gabriel," Mandli said. "Gabriel relayed the messages to Muhammad."

The days of Ramadan start with a pre-dawn meal called suhur, after which Muslims offer morning prayers, Mandli said.

This pre-dawn meal typically occurs at 5 a.m.

The meal at the end of the day is called iftar, and it occurs after sundown, Khan said.

This is when the fast is broken by eating a date and a light snack. Evening prayers are then offered, and dinner follows.

Meals will be sponsored by UMass on Feb. 11, and Mt. Holyoke College on Feb. 17.

A time for introspection

"It's a time for realizing there is so much we have, and understanding people who are poor or may not have three meals a day," said Maha Kazi, a senior communications major from the United Arab Emirates and a former public relations officer for the Muslim Student Association.

"If you miss a day you have to feed about 40 people to make up for it. It is a time to be charitable and to give what you have," Kazi said.

Maintaining the fast

The day after Ramadan comes eid-al-fitr, Mandli said. This is when Muslims dress up and pray at a mosque.

The praying is followed by speeches that are motivational, inspirational and spiritual, as they circle around messages of peace, he said.

"We then shake hands and hug people, even if we don't know each other," Mandli said.

"It's a month of forgiveness and mercy from Allah...a time of prayer, more praying than we normally would," Khan said. "It's a spiritual cleansing."

Khan, Mandli and Kazi attended classes last week, and each plan on doing so for the remainder of Ramadan.

"It is hard," Mandli said. "If you have dedication, you can get through it."

"Classes keep you preoccupied," Kazi said. "It's not too difficult because you're busy doing something. Everyone around you who isn't [fasting] makes it hard."

Baseball strike continues; Clinton steps up to bat

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - Baseball players and owners failed to settle the strike by President Clinton's Monday deadline, forcing mediator W.J. Usery to make his own proposal to the White House.

After four futile days at the bargaining table, Usery said Sunday he became convinced the sides wouldn't strike a deal. Usery will present his plan to the president sometime Monday - Clinton's deadline for an agreement and the 100th anniversary of Babe Ruth's birth.

"At the pace we were going, it would take a long time to get where we were going," Usery said. "We can't continue to move in inches when we need to move in yards."

Owners want a new economic system that will control players' salaries, which averaged nearly $1.2 million in 1994. The union, intent on preserving its gains of the past two decades, struck Aug. 12 to fight off the owners' demand to place a cap on costs. Only after Usery gives the president his proposed terms will he divulge them to both sides. He will urge players and owners to accept, but if they don't, the next move will be up to Clinton. The president could use Usery's solution as the basis for special legislation to impose a settlement. Any bill would have to be approved by Congress and signed by the president.

Acting Commissioner Bud Selig, who has attended just one bargaining session during his 2 ...year tenure, was to arrive in Washington on Monday morning. It was Selig, the Milwaukee Brewers owner, who last Sept. 14 announced the cancellation of the World Series.

Spring training is to start a week from Thursday, and administration officials have said they are against the owners' plan to use replacement players.

"Time is running out on us," said Usery, who was appointed special mediator by Clinton last Oct. 14. "We all know the effect this is having on our nation. It's absolutely essential we try to get baseball playing again."

Usery planned to meet Sunday night at the White House with Labor Secretary Robert Reich and deputy White House counsel Bruce Lindsey, the president's point men for baseball.

The administration planned to have Usery tell negotiators to work through the night, according to a senior administration official, speaking on the condition he not be identified.

"We want to keep them guessing about what we might do," the official said. "The more they feel pressure to do it themselves, the better off we are."

Usery asked players and owners to submit "their very best position" to him on Sunday. Then, on Monday, Usery planned to give his proposal to the president even before presenting it to the parties. Usery said he would make his plan public later in the day. "I would be hopeful they would accept it," Usery said. "For us to meet the president's deadline, we have to do what we're doing. ...This is very, very serious business."

"[The drumline] went to the evening service, it was seven to nine at night," said Vargo. "With all the people there, it could have easily gone to 11 —there was a huge line."

Vargo said Liguori was not planning on coming back to UMass, he was attending Northern Essex Community College.

"This is one of the saddest things that has ever happened to the band," said Marching Band Director George N. Parks. "He had a lot of respect and friendship with the other members."

Parks said this year's video yearbook will be dedicated to the memory of Liguori.

Teachers' program plans to explore WW II

Minear presents alternate view of the Pacific War

By Emily Gold
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts history professor has put together a program to expose teachers to an alternative view of the Pacific War.

Richard Minear will direct a National Endowment for the Humanities Summer Institute for high school teachers and librarians. The institute is intended to increase awareness of viewpoints and experiences rarely addressed in teaching World War II history, he said.

The program, entitled "The War in the Pacific: History and Memory" is organized by the Five College Center for East Asian Studies as part of an outreach effort, according to Minear.

"We are trying to give them intellectual stimulation and recharge their motors," Minear said.

Minear, whose training is in Japanese history, said that the summer institute will contrast Japanese and American experiences during the Pacific War, including comparisons of end-of-war celebrations and the impact of the atomic bomb.

In traditional teaching about the Pacific War, history focuses on European experiences. Just another display of American ignorance— a continuing theme in the teaching of Japanese history, Minear said.

"The Pacific side of things does not get as much attention," Minear said.

Many Americans are not represented in traditional portrayals of stereotypical Americans during the war, resulting in "a gross generalization myth," according to Minear.

American socialists, gays and women are groups whose experiences in the Pacific War are often overlooked, Minear said.

The program will include films, talks with filmmakers, extensive reading and lectures and discussions with Japanese teachers, Minear said.

"We bring the best and most lively speakers, and we try to expose the teachers to red-hot material that they can bring into the classroom," said Minear.

Personal and local accounts of the Pacific War will be examined, since students can relate to individual experiences, Minear said.

"Anybody relates to people more than statistics," he said.

Aaron Berman, associate professor of History at Hampshire College, will speak on American issues at the institute.

In discussing American experiences, Berman said he will give as "inclusive and complex a view as possible."

"History is complex," Berman said. "We want to show how the war in the Pacific as it is usually told is a lot more complicated than it seems."

The summer institute, to be held at Smith College, will also be directed by Kathleen Woods Masalski, program coordinator of the Five College Center and a UMass doctoral student in the School of Education.

The NEH asked the Center to organize this year's program after the success of a similar institute directed by Masalski and Minear in 1992, said Ann Playe, administrative assistant at the Center.

Japanese teachers in the previous summer institute gave first-hand accounts of how the Pacific War is taught in Japan, Playe said.

"Teachers received tremendous insight in how this piece of mutual history is approached," Playe said.

Though only 25 spots are available in the program, the Center has already received about 100 inquiries regarding participation, Minear said.

"We were encouraged by the NEH because it was a big success last time," Playe said. "We were able to give these teachers a wealth of information."

English profs to read poetry Wier, Mariani preview work

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts English professors will read from their manuscripts, some of which are unpublished, Tuesday at Herter Hall.

Professors Dara Wier and Paul Mariani will read both published and unpublished poetry at the English Department's Colloquium, "Tuesday's at Four." The reading will be introduced by Pulitzer Prize winning poet and UMass English professor, James Tate.

"This is an opportunity for students and colleagues to hear what their most recent works are," said Tate. "That's always very exciting."

Each reading will be approximately 25 to 30 minutes long, according to Mariani.

Wier has been with the University for nine years. She teaches both poetry and prose writing classes. She will be reading selections from her latest book, currently titled Arrival View of the Labyrinth which should be published later next year, Wier said.

"Reading to your home audience is the most daunting one to read to," Wier said.

"I did not want to generalize about themes," Wier said of her work. Selections of Wier's poetry include "Fly on the Wall," "The Cubist Rotisary," "From My House to Yours" and "I remember Rilke."

Mariani has been at the University for 27 years. He teaches both modern and contemporary poetry classes at UMass. Mariani will be reading some requested poems along with new poems from his latest book, currently titled Casualty Reports, to be published in 1996.

According to Mariani, his poems will touch upon such themes as world events, old teachers, and especially on personal loss; such as the loss of friends and family.

Specific selections include "The Republic," based on the book of Greek philosopher, Plato, and Mariani's personal experiences teaching a class of police officers. "Ghosts," a poem about family memories, and "Quid Pro Quo," a poem about marriage, are also among his selections.

"I have to write poetry," said Mariani. "It's the only way I can express certain feelings, certain ideas."

The reading begins Feb. 7 at 4 p.m. in 301 Herter Hall.

Appreciating life's furry friends

Something about the snow makes everyone go a little wacky I think. As I rode along the snow plagued roads yesterday with my roommate my eyes closed in on a ludicrous sight. I spotted a man walking down the middle of the road with one of those wiener dogs on a leash. All I could imagine was that the dog must be thinking, "Hey man, I know you might enjoy this snowy scene but one unplowed spot and I'm a goner. I mean, I'm in bare feet here."

It was at this point that I began looking out the passenger- side window for similar sights of people using their dogs for an excuse to go outside. Dogs may get a bad rap sometimes, but it's undeniable that they are useful tools for their owners. They trudge through the snow, unarmed against the elements while their owners walk through the park and hope to find a little companionship. They are unique animals in that they will do just about anything to make their masters happy if only a meager snack is involved. You would not see a cat walking down a snow covered street. A cat would take one look outside and say, "Me, get wet? I don't think so. I'll be laying right here on your bed when you get back though."

Tara Ruelle

No one has to manipulate a dog to go outside in a blizzard; all you have to do is make it sound appealing to the unsavvy beast. I can only imagine what the wiener dog thought yesterday as it walked out into the winter wonderland. "All right, I'll go out. Come on. Hey wait a minute you're not bundling up for nothing, where are my boots, hey where's my hat buddy?" Meanwhile, the dog goes out and his owner gets the chance that someone walking by might go, "Oh look at the cute doggy woggy, hi there fellow." Assumably that conversation will lead to a human appreciation of sorts.

What better way to hit on someone than with a panting, furry dog by your side. Some how people use their dogs to show themselves off rather than the opposite. Dogs probably don't care what other dogs think of them, they walk around and exhibit their respective owners. After all, the dogs help the owners get the dates — not the other way around.

What impresses me most about these friendly, faithful creatures is that they can sit with a straight face while their owner tells a stranger some obvious lie about their pet. I have heard such winners as, "Yeah this cute little guy was in a fire and I just went in to rescue him. I knew it was dangerous, but I had to do what I had to do."

Hopeful responses would go something like, "That is so very brave and unselfish of you, I just love a guy who loves animals." Dogs take this all in a day's work, they know the game and they know the rewards. Dogs will do tricks to impress your friends, after all you hold the can opener to their dinner.

There were other dogs I saw yesterday running through the snow so that passersby might take a glance at their owners. People were cross-country skiing through the Common with their dogs gasping to catch up on foot. Fraternities were playing football in the snowy haven with the standard frat dog getting the occasional sack. All of these animals were watching their owners bask in the winter weather and cheered them on when they made the Flutie-esque touchdown throw. They weren't complaining because they had no gloves or that their wet coats wouldn't come off when they went back inside.

All I ask is that we appreciate these animals more and throw a little extra Scooby snack their way before we expose them to our antics of the day. Dogs truly can be man's best friend; let's face it they are proven babe magnets. They bring out the sensitivity in all of us, even if it only appears when we want a date. No other pet can successfully complete this task.

I told you that people get wacky when it snows, I don't even own a dog.

Freeze frames of the drifting snow

Outside the snow began to accumulate on the window sills, which gave a nice frame to the scenery outside. One of the pictures held for a moment a man in a long wool coat holding his hat against the wind, as a dog sprinted joyously past him, catching snowflakes on his flapping tongue.

"That's nice," said Jimmy to himself as he sat on one of the couches in the Cape Cod Lounge. He was drinking a coffee and working on a crossword puzzle by simply filling in any word that fit, based on his one actual answer for "river west of Belgrade."

"Hmmm?" said a girl in a blue sweater sitting next to him.

"I said that that," he said, pointing at the window. "is nice."

"The window?" she asked, laughing.

"Well, yes. The window is nice too," he said, pausing for a moment. "But I think the snow is better. Especially when it is falling on things, like on a nun or maybe a llama. Or a nun sitting on a llama. Do you like llamas?"

"Yeah..." she smiled. "I guess so. I mean, they kind of smell though, don't they?"

"I wouldn't hold it against them," Jimmy said. He looked down at his newspaper. "What's a six letter word that starts with a P and whose third letter is an O?"

"Errrr...proooo...promise...proxy..."

"Ah! People!" he cried, crouching over and scribbling it into the spaces. "What do you think of them, by the way?"

"What do I think of who?"

"People," he said, starting to chew on his pencil.

"They seem okay I guess," she shrugged. "I mean, I like people for the most part. Guess life would be pretty boring without them. I'd miss a lot of things if people weren't around."

"Yeah," he said. "I think you're right. Then there wouldn't be things like nuns in the snow."

"What do you think of them, by the way?"
"What do I think of who?"
"People," he said, starting to chew on his pencil.
"They seem okay I guess," she shrugged.
"I mean, I like people for the most part. Guess life would be pretty boring without them. I'd miss a lot of things if people weren't around."

Nathan Crick

A couple of guys stopped in front of the girl in the blue sweater. One of them had a leather jacket and a goatee and the other had long hair and a winter cap pulled down over his ears. "Hey Trish, what's up?" asked the goatee.

"Just hanging around. You know, watching the snow," she said, motioning to the windows.

"Hey, you shoulda come over last night man, it was so cool," said the hat. "Mike brought over this real nice stuff, and we all got so baked and went to the mall. Jenny bought this big bag of popcorn and kept offering it to people in front of Taco Bell, until the pigs kicked us out."

"Dingo," said Jimmy to himself as he scribbled on the newspaper.

"Yeah, that was great," said the goatee. "Musta had some kind of other stuff in it cause I kept seeing all these things out of the side of my eye. Like, I kept thinking there were people standing next to me when there weren't. Then there were these dudes in baseball hats following us around, probably thought we were freaks or something. You shoulda come."

"What were they wearing?" asked Jimmy, looking up from his newspaper.

The goatee looked around anxiously for a minute. "Umm...what?" he asked.

"What were they wearing? The people standing next to you."

The goatee shrugged. "Hell, I don't know. They were just there."

"Oh," Jimmy said. "Then do you know a four letter word that begins with a Z?"

"Uhh..."

"Zits," said Trish.

Jimmy nodded and penciled it in.

"Well, uh, I guess we'll get going," said the hat, glancing at his friend. "I'll se ya around Trish," he said.

"Take it easy guys," she said, waving.

"Later," said the goatee, and they both started walking off, talking to themselves quietly.

A gust of wind came up and whistled through the doorways in the hall. Outside a few papers went floating by and a student appeared behind consecutive windows chasing after them, like frames in a moving picture.

"What would you miss, then?" asked Jimmy.

"I'd miss the bagels," said the girl in the blue sweater. "If there were no people, I'd really miss the bagels."

Jimmy nodded. "Yeah, that too."

Letters to the Editor

A remembrance to a special friend

To the editor:

I want to take this opportunity to share with my fellow students here at UMass, the memory of my good friend, Dave Wechsler. During the third week of January, he committed suicide in a desperate attempt to end an onslaught of inner pain and depression. Dave, 21, lived next door to me in the suite of 507 Brown Residence Hall with our other close friend and suitemate, Eric Hausman. While there, Dave and I would accompany each other to dinner just about every night. We'd spend hours driving around afterwards talking about the problems we were both dealing with at the time. I was there for him, and he was there for me.

Dave Wechsler had to have been one of the nicest, coolest people I have ever had the privilege of knowing. His only fault (if you want to even call it one) was that he didn't know how to say "no" to someone. He was always there for you if you needed him, but unfortunately some people took advantage of his kindness. It was this feeling of being used, unloved and the uncertainty of his future that pushed him into a real chronic depression. During the break when he got his grades, he found out that he failed out of school which evidently pushed him over the edge. How Dave died I'd rather not go into, but I will say that is was painless and he did not suffer at all. This was Dave's peaceful style while he was alive.

I want to point out that just because Dave didn't get good grades didn't mean that he wasn't smart. Dave was brilliant. An incredible artist, deep thinker and philosopher, he could keep your attention and make you think deeply about whatever he would create or had to say. His artwork and poetry were of the highest caliber in their beauty and meaning, a quality about Dave I've always admired and envied. He definitely had a good head on his shoulders, no doubt about it.

So lastly, I ask now that all of you who knew Dave to help keep his memory alive. When things got rough, think of what he'd say to you. And Dave, although I'll be going to dinner solo a lot more now, I'll never forget you dude. You were there for me and helped me pull through. You're not here now to help me get through my first loss of someone I cared about, but you helped me to get my feet on the ground to be able to deal with it. For that I thank you and promise I'll help preserve your memory as best I can. I hope that you have finally found the peace you could never find here. See-Ya.

Reader disagrees with choice of term

To the editor:

I'm not writing to disagree with Richard Gilluly, but to bicker with his terms — the reason being I am sick and tired of "Christians" being blamed for the backwards nature of American morals.

Reading Gilluly's article about the firing of Joycelyn Elders it was obvious to me that he had not seen her on ABC television, where she called her opposition the "un- Christian right."

Elders considers herself to be a Christian, and points out that these "Christian fundamentalists" sponsors public policy that cannot be correctly called Christian by any stretch of the imagination. Anyone who has meditated on the teachings of Jesus should know why.

So on behalf of all the Christians who support Elders, I would request that Gilluly find another word to refer to the so-called "religious right." My best suggestion would be "fanatically tweaked."

State needs to help students

To the editor:

Gov. William F. Weld, obviously, didn't need any financial assistance when he matriculated at Harvard University; however, the rest of us need it — some desperately. For some, like myself, it determines whether we re-enroll for another semester or not.

I know a great many students who fall into this category. Nevertheless, Weld is taking a risk with "setting up a grant program allowing them to recoup the money if they raise the same amount from donors." The question to Weld, any supporter, or advocate of this proposed $10 million budget cut for higher education is: What if the amount expected is not raised? What then?

Education should not be played with as inveterate gamblers of politics do so with other issues. Why? Because education is the foundation of civilization and thus our already deplorable civilization needs future leaders to ameliorate some of the greedy forefather's blunders.

I implore earnestly that every and all students write to their own representatives, in the House and Senate.

Emanuel Fernandes

State neglects public higher ed.

To the editor:

Professor Christian Garaud was being entirely to kind in his letter to the editor in the Collegian (Feb. 3). The Hooker–Weld stance on public higher education should come as no surprise to anyone with even a passing acquaintance of Massachusetts politics. What we're dealing with are two entirely unsavory characters who are not renowned for their moral fortitude and intellectual probity.

At a time when the University has been reeling from severe budgetary problems, Hooker found enough time to line his pockets with yet another $14,000. He also graded the quality of the education provided at UMass in a cavalier and high-handed fashion, by using spurious numbers no doubt prepared in his Boston lair.

Leading the reactionary backlash against the poor and working people of Massachusetts, Weld also had time, through secret deals and hurried legislation, to give himself and all his legislative cronies significant pay raises. Not surprisingly enough, he has followed it up with his own poor evaluation of the University.

The Hooker–Weld approach to public higher education has taken the "public" and the "education" out, leaving only "higher" salaries for themselves and their accomplices.

Report on campus described incorrectly

To the editor:

I would like to clarify some statements made in two Collegian articles dealing with a report on the University released by the Massachusetts Association of Scholars. The headline of the Dec. 15, 1994 article "Study Of UM did not contact sources," was erroneous, since key figures in the administration were indeed contacted. A careful reading of Turmoil and Tension at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst: History, Analysis and Recommended Solutions would have revealed that I contacted (among other sources) Chancellor David K. Scott and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne Vanin.

On page 65 of the report there is a lengthy quotation from a letter Scott wrote me in response to a request for information regarding the Administration's handling of various campus disturbances in 1992. The quotation allows readers to learn Scott's interpretations of certain incidents, such as the theft of copies of the Collegian in May of that year and the occupation of Washington Residence Hall in October, and to see how they differ from my own.

On page 60 of the report I quote Vanin, whom I questioned by telephone in response to the February 1994 occupation of the Undergraduate Admissions Center. Since remarks made over the telephone are subject to misunderstanding, I wrote down my version of Vanin's statements, sent her a copy by registered mail, and having received no comment after several weeks, assumed that I had quoted her correctly.

I was also in contact with the Office of Institutional Research and Planning (OIRP). I wrote to OIRP Director Marilyn Blaustein requesting certain data sets which were not published in OIRP's Factbook and which I needed to sustain some of my conclusions. By way of reply, Blaustein phoned me asking why I wanted the data. When I told her, she said she would have to talk to other university officials and get back to me. She never did get back to me. I wrote her another letter, repeating and refining my request, to which she made no reply.

The secondary headline of the same article, "Conclusions are tentative due to lack of data, author said," was misleading. The majority of the conclusions reached by the report are not at all tentative, as a reading of any chapter (particularly "Findings and Recommendations") will reveal. Only two assertions are less than definitive, precisely because the University refused, as explained above, to release the two sets of data upon which they depend. Nevertheless, both assertions are offered as strong possibilities, given the available data and the indications of national patterns. Readers of the report will be able to come to their own conclusions.

A Dec. 12, 1994 article on the same report states that the University's minority population "is approximately 10 percent...according to MAS." Actually, the report accepts without comment (on page 6) Scott's figure of 12 percent for the fall of 1993. The assumption of the 12 percent figure is essential to the report's finding that, after making allowances for differences in the ways the University and the U.S. census defines minorities, the University's minority population currently very nearly matches that of the state.

Anyone interested in reading the report may obtain a copy by writing to MAS, P.O. Box 845, Cambridge, MA 02140.

The Bobs lend voices to NoHo

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

In light of the recent trend toward the purity of voices layered together in intricate harmonies and catchy rhythms, the Iron Horse in Northampton will give the Valley a double dose of a capella madness February 7 and 8 at 7 p.m., courtesy of The Bobs.

The a capella quartet is comprised of Bob Greene, Matthew Bob Stull, Joe Bob Finetti and Janie Bob Scott — hence the name The Bobs. This dynamic foursome has raised its voices on six albums, taking human vocal chords to new levels of song and mimicry proving anything is possible. Their latest is entitled The Bobs Cover the Songs Of... a great addition to the album The Bobs Sing the Songs Of...

Like Bobby McFerrin, the Bobs are able to create sound and noise with one instrument only — their voices. From wailing guitars to manic drum beats, the groups does it all, capturing the essence of a capella and stretching its definition.

The Bobs sing both original material and covers of many well known songs such as "Purple Haze" from Jimi Hendrix's Are You Experienced?, "White Room" by Cream, and Beatles songs like "Strawberry Fields Forever" and "Helter Skelter."

In addition to playing clubs, the Bobs have starred on the Public Broadcasting Service in "Lonesome Pine" episodes, and are currently working on a movie soundtrack album with Jason Alexander and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

The Bobs will be playing at the Iron Horse in Northampton Feb. 7 – 8 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $13.50 adv. Call 584-0610 for more information.

Bettie Serveert falls victim to sophomore slump

LAMPREY
Bettie Serveert
Matador / Atlantic

Oh no, another band that has been listening to too many Neil Young records — it has plagued Dinosaur Jr. and it is now doing the same to Bettie Serveert. The band has transformed itself from an exciting indie pop band to nothing more than a classic rock bore.

In 1993 Bettie Serveert came from the obscurity of their homeland, the Netherlands, and released Palomine, one of the most promising debuts in recent memory. The album quickly rose to the tops of college radio charts largely due to the hit single "Tom Boy."

Lamprey is not a bad album, but it lacks all the originality that made their debut a smashing success. The first two minutes of the lead track, "Keepsake" sound exactly like a Neil Young song, note for note. Almost all of the songs follow the same songwriting recipe: poppy melodies backed by classic rock guitar.

The only saving factor is the breathtakingly beautiful voice of lead vocalist Carol van Dijk. Each song is as forgettable as the one before it; even after several listens, not one tune stands out.

Has Bettie Serveert already reached their prime? Probably not. Years from now Lamprey will be looked upon as the average sophomore slump. Both U2 and R.E.M. successfully overcame their mediocre second albums, don't be surprised if Bettie Serveert does too. C–

PORTRAIT OF AN AMERICAN FAMILY
Marilyn Manson
Interscope / Nothing Records

Music has already established that "nothing's shocking" — thanks to the famed lyric in "Ted, Just Admit It," by Jane's Addiction. Some may even say that Jane's took it as far as it could go. Others argue that "shock rock" wouldn't have even evolved if it wasn't for David Bowie and his numerous alter egos: Ziggy Stardust, Aladdin Sane, etc.

Trax On Trax-Off

But no matter what anyone says, someone is continually looking to further push the sanity of parents and raise young, impressionable eyebrows. This someone is Marilyn Manson.

Complete with gothic garb and a sense of morbidity, Marilyn Manson (a band, not an individual) takes as much from B-rated horror movies as they do from musical trends. This can be heard on their debut album Portrait Of An American Family.

Song titles like "Cake And Sodomy," "Organ Grinder" and "Wrapped In Plastic" are pretty self explanatory, while one listen to songs like the spoken word ditty "Prelude (The Family Trip)" lets us in on their twisted vision and perception of the American family.

Adding to the eerie vibe of the record is the use of sampled dialogue about death and destruction from horror flicks such as Desperate Living.

Musically, Marilyn Manson rock out with as much evil spirit as the words convey (which is to say a lot). Mutated vocals, brutal guitar riffs, and a hard-driving beat throughout contribute to their industrial, metallic edge. It's no surprise then that Portrait is on Nine Inch Nails mastermind Trent Reznor's new label, Nothing Records, and is co-produced by Reznor, himself.

Whether you like them or not, Marilyn Manson will at least succeed in getting a reaction, which shows that there's still virgin territory in the old shock tactic after all.

The Dave Matthews Band will co-headline with Big Head Todd and The Monsters at Smith College.

Bands bring improv–rock to Smith

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

In the video–based MTV world we now call our homes, the two things that most up–and–coming rock bands strive for are the instant major record deal, and the obligatory four–minute–long "buzz clip."

For those groups that shy away from what the business says is "right and just" in promotion, though, opportunities to establish solid record sales and fan base are few and far in between. But thanks to old hats like the Grateful Dead and the recent national success of Phish, these preset commandments no longer possess the ultimate fear factor of non–conformity.

This Tuesday night at John M. Greene Hall on the campus of Smith College, one of the headline acts has lived by this low road philosophy, and is now reaping the fruits of their labor. Big Head Todd and The Monsters will perform their own fusion of funk, blues, and rock while sharing top billing with the eclectic jazz of The Dave Matthews Band. Both bands center their respective mind–sets on what they feel is important in their music, leaving rules and guidelines to the best of the rest.

With lead singer and guitar player Todd Park Mohr at the helm, along with his fellow Boulder, Co. bandmates Robb Squires (bass) and Brian Nevin (drums), BHTM has shied away from the typical rock and roll star mentality. Mohr is strong concerning his various but distinct songwriting and guitar techniques, especially the influences of Albert King and Stevie Ray Vaughan. Mohr relates his technique to the idea of "knowing your enemy" completely.

"Learning rules is what enables you to break rules. In other words, those disciplines are what have given me the power to not always follow the logic of every other rock and roll song," said Mohr in a recent Guitar World magazine interview.

"It's the same with guitar playing: the more you know, the more you can consciously break rules or ignore things...or, even worse, [sound] like everyone else."

With their latest stint on last summer's H.O.R.D.E. tour, which featured the Allman Brothers Band, Blues Traveler and Sheryl Crow, the work of this unique band has finally reached the mass media. But do not get me wrong, it is not like this trio has walked an unsuccessful path since their formation in 1986. After the first two releases on Giant Records, Another Mayberry (1989) and Midnight Radio (1990), commercial sales for their breakthrough 1992 release, Sister Sweetly went over 600,000 without the need of video and radio exposure.

With last year's Strategem moving away from the straightforwardness of their best seller to date, the unique talents of Mohr's writing, singing and soloing are once again brought to the fore.

From the adaptation of a 14th century Irish poem in the ballad "Poor Miss" to the straight rock of "Kensington Line" and "Shadowlands," no genre is left untouched by the former English major.

The end result is simply that Mohr has become, along with Trey Anastasio of Phish, one of the top guitarists you have never heard about, while the Monsters have become the best two–man rhythm section this side of Double Trouble.

Tickets for tomorrow night's double bill at the John M. Greene Hall in Northampton of Big Head Todd and The Monsters and the Dave Matthews Band, with opening act The Ugly Americans, are $18.50 and will be sold at The Northampton Box Office and Strawberries Outlets.

THE PINK ALBUM
Tuscadero
Teenbeat Records

Judging Tuscadero by their musical prowess is like trying to judge GWAR for their lyrical insight — it just can't be done. These four pop cum punk brats pump out high energy, three–chord assaults that are so raw that haven't even found their way into the garage yet.

Like the evil twins of major–label marketing dream Veruca Salt, Tuscadero toss off simple, ultra–catchy riffs delivered with childlike–glee courtesy of singers/guitarists Melissa Farris and Margaret McCartney. Of course this may all seem pretty standard by now thanks to such bands as The Breeders and Belly — and it is — but Tuscadero manages to just slip by thanks to their no frills (and I mean no frills) delivery.

The band revels in junior high–like maturity, complete with songs about toys, cute boys and their favorite candy — even their name comes from the television show Happy Days. This disregard for growing–up may just be Tuscadero's saving grace, since their charm far outweighs their musical merits. The Pink Album is complete with lo–fi production, bum notes, and extremely rough vocal takes, all adding to Tuscadero's often refreshing adolescent persona.

Not to say that there are no good songs on The Pink Album. Tracks such as "Just My Size," "Dime A Dozen" and "Mr. Pleasant" have enough hooks to stay lodged in the head of even the most fickle pop fan. But still, the kids of Tuscadero have a long way to go. Maybe a little less whining next time and instead a few more ideas. B– (Matt Audette)

PERSONAL BEST
Team Dresch
Chainsaw / Candy–Ass

While the rest of the music world is hung up on looking for the next Green Day, Team Dresch has quietly released one of the best albums in recent memory. This band does more in 24 minutes than most bands do in a lifetime. Each and every song is essential listening as it shows the many faces of this fascinating band.

Like so many of today's popular bands, Team Dresch hails from the Pacific Northwest; Portland Oregon to be exact. They take their varied influences from Bikini Kill, Tiger Trap, and even the Indigo Girls. Musically they are as talented and versatile as any band seen on MTV and in concert they often switch instruments as well as lead vocals.

The track "Freewheel" is Team Dresch at their best. Imagine a punk Indigo Girls. Other tracks such as "Fagaterian and Dyke" and "Hate The Christian Right" showcase the band's political edge.

Musically and politically this band is as important as any band today. In the age where punk rock means big bucks, Team Dresch reminds us all of the true meaning of punk. The year may still be somewhat young but Personal Best will no doubt be one of the best albums of 1995. A (Michael Burke)

1995 REQUEST FOR PROPOSALS

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations is soliciting innovative proposals for educational activities and programs which have the following goals:

- promote mutual respect
- enhance understanding of multicultural and social justice issues
- encourage collaboration between different campus communities and constituencies

Eligibility: Undergraduates, graduate students, staff and faculty, as individuals or groups

Award Criteria: Proposed activities

- must bring together persons from two or more communities or constituencies in a joint activity
- must demonstrate collaboration of communities or constituencies in the proposal planning process
- must promote mutual respect and understanding on the campus or larger community
- should represent new programs or collaborating partnerships as opposed to annual programs or continuations of past projects
- should be completed by the end of the fall 1995 semester

Examples of Activities Which Could be Funded: Forums, speakers, film/video series, seminars, workshops, public education programs about hate crimes and incidents, outreach activities to secondary schools and home communities, community public service programs, faculty/student collaboration to develop new courses, performance events, printed materials, posters.

Proposal Components:

- a clear description of how the proposed activities will meet both the goals and award criteria
- a list of groups involved and the person or persons responsible for the activity
- a mechanism for evaluating impact and effectiveness of the activities
- a timeline indicating when the activities would start and conclude
- a budget

Award Ranges: $250 to $1500, with total of all awards not to exceed $10,000

Submission Date and Location: Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations (545-0851), 206 Middlesex House, by 12:00 p.m., Friday, March 3, 1995.

Clinton checks out UMass–GW

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON D.C. — In addition to the 5020 regular screaming fans that packed the Charles E. Smith center, there was a more distinguished visitor as well.

President William J. Clinton.

Accompanied by daughter Chelsea and one of her friends, the Commander–in–Chief and quite a few security guards were present to watch the hometown George Washington Colonials upset the No. 1 Massachusetts Minutemen.

Dressed in a maroon and blue golf shirt and brown pants, Clinton sat in what GW coach Mike Jarvis called "my sisters' seats" to watch the game.

The visit was kept a secret until just before game time. Many fans and media seemed surprised at the metal detectors and other increased security, but with the rivalry between the two schools, and city's high crime rate, nobody seemed to suspect anything unusual.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said that his team was unaware that Clinton would be attending until its arrival at the Smith Center.

"I said to them, you sell–out every gym, now you got the President," Calipari said.

The Colonials were successful using zone defense, which is an unfamiliar tactic for them. Jarvis said the plan came from Clinton himself.

"When I talked to him a couple weeks ago [about this game], he said that he was a big basketball fan," Jarvis said. "He said he had watched us play and thought we should play a little zone."

Clinton visited with both teams' following the game.

"He was very gracious," Calipari said. "He's a good man."

As the President was leaving, UMass senior point guard, whom his teammates sometimes call the Governor, high fived the Chief Executive on the way out.

Jarvis was thrilled at the exposure that the upset combined with Clinton's visit would create for his team.

"How many teams have had the President in their locker room," Jarvis said. "When people turn on CNN and ESPN, this is all they're going to see all day."

In another surprise, the Minuteman unveiled their never before worn before sleek black road uniforms for the game as well.

The somewhat superstitious Minutemen may never wear them again after losing in them.

It was GW who got the easier scoring opportunities, much of that being a testament to the Colonials' zone defense, which gave the Minutemen trouble — the coverage on the perimeter, the doubling and sometimes tripling down on Lou Roe (21 points, 12 boards), etc. GW also out–rebounded Massachusetts 45–40.

"I think we started out the game playing aggressively on the offensive end of the court, running the floor, getting some easy baskets, attacking the basket, getting offensive rebounds — I think that set the tone for the game," Jarvis said.

Massachusetts jumped out to an early 9–8 lead on a three– pointer by Edgar Padilla (six points, four assists), before GW went on an 11–6 run capped off by Nimbo Hammons' layup with 11:06 to make it 20–14.

The Colonials' lead got as high as eight, 38–30, on a three– pointer by Kwame Evans [game–high 27 points, including his 1000th point early in the first half], before going into half–time with a 38–32 lead.

"I hope that UMass doesn't use [Cambs's] absence as an excuse, because that's all it would be," Jarvis said.

The loss should prove to be a motivator for the Minutemen.

"I think we're going to be a hungry ball club again," Roe said. "We're not on top of the world anymore and we want to get there."

The two teams will face each other again on February 14, at the William D. Mullins Center. Roe did not hesitate when asked if he was looking forward to the rematch.

"Damn right, I'm looking forward to it," he said. "We don't like losing. This one hurt."

out, the additions would be particularly helpful in men's basketball.

"These are schools that are traditionally good in men's basketball, which will be helpful in obtaining a television package," Bruno said.

All the teams entering are expected to begin participation in the conference for the 1995–96 season.

Speculation was that the division break down would be done geographically George Washington, Duquesne, Xavier, Dayton, Virginia Tech and one of the Philadelphia schools would be in one division, while the other two Philly schools, Rhode Island, Fordham and St. Bonaventure would join Massachusetts in the other.

Women's track places first at URI

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

This weekend, the University of Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team placed first in a quad meet at the University of Rhode Island.

UMass finished with a score of 184 points while Rhode Island placed second with 158 points, Holy Cross was third with 122 points, and Dartmouth was fourth with 82 points.

"Overall, our athletes stepped up to the Rhode Island challenge," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We won the meet last weekend [at Dartmouth with Vermont and New Hampshire] but it was an ugly win. This weekend we seemed to pull together."

Senior Janey Meeks shattered the school high jump record and her own personal record by winning the event with a length of 5–5 ¼. She also placed first in the triple jump with a length of 38–1/2.

Freshman Rosmarie Bryan was also a double winner, placing first in the long jump with a length of 17–8 1/4 and in the 55–meter hurdles with a time of 8.36 minutes.

Senior Kelly Liljeblad won the mile with a time of 4:54.51. Liljeblad is already an NCAA provisional qualifier in the mile and 5000 meters. Junior Nicole Roberts also had a good performance, finishing first in the 55–meter dash with a time of 7.39 minutes and second in the 200 meters with a time of 26.31 minutes. Roberts competed very well despite feeling ill before the meet.

Junior Jen Waeger shined in the 1000 meters finishing first with a time of 3:00.15 minutes. Freshman Rebecca Donaghue also finished first in the 800 meters with a time of 2:18.36.

The 4x400 meter relay was easily won by the UMass foursome of freshman Angela Osei Mensah (who replaced Roberts), Donaghue, freshman Silifia Kenku, and junior Megan O'Neil who ran last. Massachusetts also won the distance medley relay.

There were also several strong second place finishes by UMass athletes. Junior Christie Martin placed second in the 20 lb. weight throw with a distance of 46.0 feet and in the shot put with a distance of 39.6 feet. For Martin, the 20 lb. weight throw is her farthest this year.

Kenku finished second in the 400 meter relay with a time of 1:01.26 while senior Kerry Aker also finished second in the 500 meters with a time of 1:22.01.

Sophomore Anya Forrest placed third in 55–meter dash with a time of 7.48 minutes and in the 55–meter hurdles with a time of 8.50 minutes.

In the 3000 meters, sophomore Kate Greenia placed fourth overall. Her finish was a personal achievement after missing the cross–country season and most of the indoor track season. "She should be in good form and full force by the spring," LaFreniere said.

This meet ended the team's dual meet season with a record of 13–3. Next week, UMass enters their championship season with the Atlantic 10 Championship meet at URI.

"We have been training hard twice a day for the month of January," LaFreniere said. "We are pretty well rounded and getting stronger in all events."

The team is suffering from injuries and sickness and will not be the threat that they have the potential to be. Sophomore Melissa Langevin was knocked down during the cross–country season and is still recovering. Freshman

Stacie Lavoie is out for knee surgery while sophomore Erika Doyle who placed second at the New England Championships last year is suffering from shin problems.

"We are missing the athletes we need to be in first place but we still expect to be in the top three," LaFreniere said. "With them, we would give West Virginia a real challenge."

UM gyms shine; snow postpones meets

Compiled by Candice Flemming

Women's gym victorious: The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastic team won a quad–meet held Friday at Boyden Gym. The Minutewomen (189.175 points) finished ahead of Rutgers (181.625), Vermont (177.600) and M.I.T. (172.200). UMass' point total was its high est team score of the season.

Tve Minutewomen recorded the top three finishes on all four events in the meet. Junior J.J. Tolhurst won the all– around competition with a total of 38.65. She finished first on the uneven bars (9.55), the balance beam (9.75) and the floor exercise (9.80). Her score on the beam tied the highest score on the beam in the Atlantic 10 this season.

Tara Swartz also performed well, placing second in the all–around competition (38.15). She was first on the vault (9.625), second on the bars (9.35), second on the beam (9.50) and third on the floor exercise (9.625).

The Minutewomen set a season–best record on the balance beam recording five of the top six scores for a team total of 47.550.

Men's gym wins quad–meet: The UMass men's gymnastics team defeated Vermont, M.I.T., and Dartmouth Friday at Boyden Gym. The Minutemen finished with a total of 206.85 points while Vermont had 178.40, M.I.T. finished with 171.95 and Dartmouth scored 115.20.

Sophomore Kiat Oboler won the all–around competition with 51.25 points. He finished first on the floor exercise (9.15), still rings (9.00) and high bar (8.65). Jason Lee won the pommel horse with a 9.00, Michael Sangirardi won the vault with a 9.10 and Keith Showstack finished first on the parallel bars with a 9.20.

Gymnasts honored: Two members of the UMass men's gymnastics team were honored last week in the weekly awards given out by the East Coast Athletic Conference.

Sophomore Ruslan Shupak was named the ECAC co– Gymnast of the Week while freshman Kevin Schwartz earned ECAC Rookie of the Week honors.

In UMass' meet against Navy (Jan. 28), Shupak scored a 9.775 on vault when he performed a hand spring double front. The score set a UMass record and also made Shupak the top–ranked vaulter in the NCAA this season. Schwartz also set a new school record when he scored a 9.90 on still rings in UMass' meet against Air Force (Jan. 24). He is the top–ranked gymnast in the NCAA on the rings.

Meets postponed: The men's indoor track meet on Sunday was postponed until today while the women's gymnastics meet on Sunday was postponed. No makeup date has been set yet.

Mallen looks for consistency

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

After stunning the college hockey world at the end of January, it was back down to reality this weekend for the University of Massachusetts.

On January 28 UMass pulled off the biggest upset of the year, a 4–2 shocker of No. 1 Maine. Well, Hockey East's other top 10 teams came into the William D. Mullins Center and handled the Minutemen. It was Boston University (5–1) on Friday night and New Hampshire (7–1) last night.

"After Maine, we can't sneak up on anybody anymore," Coach Joe Mallen said.

Are the Minutemen as good as the Maine upset looked? No. Are they as bad as the scores indicate from this past weekend? Probably not. Somewhere in between some level of consistency must be found.

One cog which may have been found is a goaltender, where freshmen Brian Regan has really emerged. He recorded a season record 51 saves in the Maine upset, then matched that in the BU loss. Last night Regan picked up 42 saves.

"Regan is moving in the right direction, he again played a great game. We've built this around good goaltending and our young defense will come," Mallen said.

"It's been a little frustrating, we haven't been able to get it going on offense. But, sometimes its them who pick us up when we give up a bunch of goals," Regan said.

One other component for UMass that has clicked is the top forward line. Rob Bonneau (11 goals, 12 assists for 23 points) centers for Sal Manganaro (10–7–17) and Tom Perry (4–13–17).

"If we can get the rest of our lines playing up to that level, then we can really be something," Mallen said.

Teams around Hockey East have begun to notice the top line, trying to take them out of it. For example,

CHRIS RAGUSA / COLLEGIAN

Tom Perry and the Minutemen fell to New Hampshire last night at the Mullins Center, 1–7.

■ men's hockey

by Bogunlecki and Picau.

No. 4 BU outshot UMass 56–14 Friday and cruised on the strength of five goals scorers.

"We just kept putting the puck on net," BU Coach Jack Parker said. "They let us shoot from outside."

Tom Noble won round two in the battle of freshman goaltenders, though Regan matched his impressive save total against Maine with 51 more stops.

"I saw [Regan] play real well in Boston, and he made a couple of the unit was shutout the last two games. The result: UMass combines for two goals in two lopsided losses.

Lack of depth is what separates UMass from the rest of the established HE clubs. UNH got three goals from its third line (Steve Picau–Eric Boguniecki–Bob Gagnon), including the game winner by Boguniecki.

"Overall, for the most part, we were outmatched. We just aren't as talented as teams like BU and UNH. I look at UNH and see a team as good as the Top 4 (which includes BU and Maine) in the nation," Mallen.

For the Minutemen the UNH game was their 10th in 22 days. It marked the fourth time in the past five games that UMass has faced a team in the Top 10.

"We just didn't have the legs tonight. We are worn down, I could tell from the start that we didn't have it," Mallen said.

One–Timers — The crowds at Mullins have to be categorized as disappointing. Friday night saw 4,752 fans, while only 2,147 attended last night. This after a record crowd of 6,834 for the win over Maine . . . A year after reviving the UMass program with 20 wins, Mallen now has 20 losses in the inaugural Hockey East season . . . Heading into the UNH game only three Minutemen were on the "plus" side of the plus/minus. Brian Corcoran led the way (+6), with Bonneau (+3) and John Jacques (+1) following . . . UMass gets its last crack at pre–season No. 8 selection Merrimack on Friday. The Warriors came into Mullins surprised with a sweep, 4–3 and 3–1 on Dec. 2–3.

Regan could not prevent BU from gaining a 5–0 lead as senior captain Jacques Joubert scored and handed out two assists. Bob Lachance had a goal and an assist, Doug Wood and Chris Kelleher chipped in power play goals and Chris Fawcett got UMass on the board at 12:39 of the third, scoring his fifth goal of the year.

UMass was plagued again by excessive penalties, granting 11 power plays to BU, two of which it converted. BU had nine power plays in each of the first two games with UMass, and it scored on six of those opportunities.

"That's got to be a big change [in number of penalties] or they're going to keep getting hurt," Parker said.

BU's depth is so resounding that it can afford to scratch a first round draft pick (defenseman Jeff Kealty) on many nights, without injury to one of four 100–point career scorers ("Red Line" center Steve Thornton) and rest its senior, first–team all conference goaltender (Derek Herlofsky) in favor of Noble, a freshman, who would have begun the season third on the depth chart had J.P. McKersie not been injured before the season.

Georgia Tech upsets No. 5 Maryland

ATLANTA (AP) - Travis Best scored 30 points and freshman Matt Harpring 28 as No. 21 Georgia Tech snapped fifth-ranked Maryland's six-game winning streak 100-91 Saturday.

The Yellow Jackets (15-6 overall, 6-3 Atlantic Coast Conference) extended their home floor winning streak to 15 games and beat the Terps at Atlanta for the 13th time in the last 14 games.

Maryland (17-4, 7-2) twice had leads of 11 points in the first half and led 66-61 midway through the second half before Best started the Yellow Jackets' comeback with a 12-footer in the lane and a 3-pointer from the top of the key for a 66-66 tie with 9:32 to play.

Duane Simpkins led the Terps with 24 points. Joe Smith was held to 14 points and four rebounds before fouling out with 3:24 remaining and the Terps trailing 82-76.

Mississippi State 83, No. 8 Arkansas 62

STARKVILLE, Miss. (AP) - Darryl Wilson scored 25 points as Mississippi State beat No. 8 Arkansas 83-62 Saturday, taking over the lead in the Southeastern Conference Western Division and making a strong case for a Top 25 ranking.

The Bulldogs (14-4, 6-2 SEC) won their third game in five days, including a 70-47 victory over No. 25 Florida on Wednesday, and beat the Razorbacks at home for the third straight season. Arkansas (17-5, 6-4), after trailing by 10 at halftime, cut the gap to 57-52 with 11:08 left after Scott Thurman's rainbow 3-pointer capped a 13-4 run. The Razorbacks never got any closer. Mississippi State scored the next eight points, including 3-pointers by Marcus Grant and Marcus Bullard, and held a double-digit lead the rest of the game.

No. 6 Kentucky 77, No. 10 Syracuse 71

LEXINGTON, Ky. (AP) - Tony Delk hit a late 3-pointer, sparking No. 6 Kentucky to a 77-71 victory Sunday over No. 10 Syracuse in a game that looked more like hot-potato than basketball.

The two teams committed a total 58 turnovers, 33 by Syracuse (16-3) and 25 by Kentucky (15-5), both season highs.

The sloppy victory was the first for Kentucky coach Rick Pitino in seven games against Syracuse's Jim Boeheim and marked the Wildcats' first triumph this season over a top 10 team. Pitino served as an assistant on Boeheim's staff from 1976-78.

Miami 67, No. 13 Georgetown 61

MIAMI (AP) - The Miami Hurricanes kept their cool, and John Thompson lost his.

Miami took advantage of a late technical foul against the Georgetown coach, withstanding a comeback by the 13th-ranked Hoyas for a 67-61 victory Saturday night.

The technical, which came when Thompson protested a foul call with 4:14 left, cost the Hoyas momentum and allowed Miami to score four points on the next possession for a 60-49 lead.

No. 4 Connecticut 99, St. John's 82

NEW YORK (AP) - It was appropriate that a shooter, the streakiest type of player in college basketball, led No. 4 Connecticut to a victory that gave it a record-setting streak. Brian Fair hit five 3-pointers in a 5:25 span of the second half to lead the Huskies to a 99-82 victory over St. John's on Saturday night, their 15th consecutive Big East regular-season win.

Connecticut (17-1, 10-0) had been tied for the conference record of 14 straight with the 1984-85 St. John's team.

"We mentioned the record last game when we didn't play well, but tonight we played well," Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun said. "Brian's performance off the bench was tremendous."

No. 9 Michigan State 67, Ohio State 58

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) - Iud Heathcote, making his farewell tour around the Big Ten after 19 years as Michigan State's coach, says it's often easier to remember the defeats than the victories. He almost got a lasting memory on his final trip to Ohio State. The ninth-ranked Spartans went over 11 minutes without a field goal in the second half as a 19-point lead dwindled to four, but Shawn Respert scored his team's final 13 points as Michigan State pulled out a 67-58 victory Saturday night.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen will need Crystal Carroll to continue her outstanding play if they are to beat Rutgers tonight at 7 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen, on the other hand, have continued their hot streak. UMass is 12–6 overall, winners of 12 of their last 13 games. Their 7–1 league mark is good enough for a first place tie in the A–10.

UMass is coming off an 89–64 thrashing of West Virginia Thursday night at the Mullins, a game that saw Massachusetts sophomore Crystal Carroll pour in 28 points, a career high for the forward.

Everything seemed to go right for the Minutewomen, who placed five players in double figures including junior Octavia Thomas (15 points) and freshman Tez Kraft (a career high 13 points). UMass also got excellent play from junior point guard Trish Hopson (seven assists, one turnover) as they ran their winning streak to six games.

Coach Theresa Grentz's Lady Knights enter the game led by Liz Hanson, a junior guard who is averaging 14.5 points per game. Hanson, a preseason pick for the Atlantic 10's first team, scored 19 points in the last game against UMass, which tied her with Thomas for the game high.

Rutgers has also gotten some scoring punch from freshman Alicia Sheeler. The 6–foot 2–inch forward blasted Temple for 42 points less than a week ago, and is leading the Lady Knights with an average of 15.2 ppg. The reigning A–10 Rookie of the Week is also second on the team with 7.0 rebounds per game, and has led Rutgers in scoring on seven occasions.

Many felt that the company's new dress code was too stringent.

Your Horoscope

ARIES (March 21–April 19) New technology will save you valuable time. Dress for success when attending a makeup or break business meeting. Visualize yourself where you want to be in 10 years. Important changes are long overdue.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) Your persuasive powers are particularly potent now. Higher-ups will grant special favors. Push yourself to get out and meet people, you will be warmly welcomed.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20). Positive thinking leads to rapid progress on important projects. An innovative approach will help you solve a business dilemma. Romance makes you smile.

CANCER (June 21–July 22). Financial details should be scrutinized before you sign any documents. A hunch will put you in touch with people who can further your career. A love strategy will work out even better than anticipated.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) Greater financial security depends on your restructuring debt and creating new investment strategies. Do not be rattled by a sudden change in plans or a work-related dispute.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) You are ready to broaden your financial horizons. Consult experts for ways to increase your influence. Romance may be sensitive. An old showdown with your mate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) A smile will help you open career doors. Travel plans may change at the last minute. Be flexible. Showing your friends how highly you regard them will keep your relationships strong. Real estate values increase.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) Try to keep up with your letter-writing. Clients or customers who feel neglected may go elsewhere. Children begin to play a greater role in your life. Passions will run high tonight. Be discreet.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21). Refuse to take sides in a family feud. Let everyone know of your concern but be low. You and your mate are on the same wavelength. Minor disagreements can be ironed out with diplomacy.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) Focus on the success you want to achieve. Concentrating on new work methods and the latest technology will boost production figures. Influential people are impressed by your versatility. An old friend returns to town.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) A May–Dec. romance ignites. Have the courage to express your feelings with close friends or family members. Someone who is trustworthy and discreet will offer you good advice. This feedback will be instructive.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) Do something to express yourself creatively. Volunteer work that benefits children will make you feel good about life. Help a friend who is going through a hard time. A sympathetic shoulder could work wonders.

GW upsets No. 1 Massachusetts

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON D.C. — It had all the emotion of a postseason tournament game, despite being played in the beginning of February.

It had the presence of the 42nd President of the United States, with Bill Clinton and his daughter Chelsea in attendance. It had the star center of the No. 1 team in America sitting out the game due to injury, as the loss of Marcus Camby handicapped Massachusetts. It had a raucous sell-out crowd of 5,020 thinking upset.

And it had the upset.

The rigors of the rough Atlantic 10 stretch caught up with the Minutemen (17–2, 9–1 in A–10) as the George Washington Colonials were victorious 78–75 on Saturday afternoon at the Smith Center. The loss ended the nation's longest winning streak at 16, and the No. 1 ranking Massachusetts has owned since Jan. 8 will be gone for the time being.

"Without Marcus Camby, and even at the beginning of the year, we weren't playing for the No. 1 ranking in the country, it just so happens we have a good schedule," Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "It wasn't about being No. 1, it's about getting better. It's about learning about our team, and I learned a lot about my team today."

One of the positives learned by Calipari was the way his team stayed in it at the end, despite only leading twice during the entire game. A Mike Williams (12 points) jumper with 26.8 seconds left narrowed the Colonial lead to four, 76–72, and after GW's Omo Moses (0 points in 29 minutes) missed two free throws, Edgar Padilla (six points, four assists) buried a trey with 10.6 seconds left to make it a one-point game, 76–75.

Williams, who has garnered six game–winning shots in his career including one in the Smith Center two years back, chalked up his fifth foul with 4.6 seconds to go.

"You talk about Mike Williams. The greatest thing in the world was that he wasn't in the game at the end, because I might have done what I've never done before — foul on the last possession (up by three)," GW coach Mike Jarvis said. "The kid is phenomenal."

With the late–game killer forced to the bench, GW's Vaughn Jones (18 points, seven rebounds) iced the two free throws, and Derek Kellogg's (17 points, six assists) lunging last–second shot from a step over half–court missed the mark, as the Colonials managed to pull off the upset. Fans rushed the court when the buzzer sounded, and Kwame Evans sat on the rim, with both fists raised high in the air.

The GW win marked the second consecutive year the Colonials have knocked off Massachusetts at the Smith Center in as many years. Last season, the No. 11 Minutemen fell to GW 77–66.

"When you play against UMass...One of the reasons why we do so well against UMass is because you have to," Jarvis said. "If you don't, they are going to kick your butt. So you better play like you're in the corner. And that's where you are — you've got no place to go, and no place to hide.

"And if they get you, they're going to bury you."

Both teams played aggressively throughout the game, as there were 50 personal fouls called (31 against Massachusetts).

"The kids fought like heck," Calipari said. "We still had opportunities to get that last one in the baskct. You have to admit, they shot a lot of free throws, but they made 'em (29–42)."

Upset could vault GW toward NCAA tourney

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

"Today is our day, and we're going to enjoy the hell out of this," George Washington Coach Mike Jarvis said following his squad's 78–75 upset over the No. 1 Massachusetts Minutemen.

In front of a packed Charles E. Smith Center that included President Bill Clinton, the Colonials outplayed the Minutemen to propel them into the national spotlight.

Jarvis has good reason to celebrate. The NCAA tournament selection committee traditionally places considerable emphasis on strong finishes.

A year ago, GW's upset of the then No. 11 Minutemen, helped vault them into their second consecutive trip to the big dance.

"Last year we got in because we beat UMass," Jarvis said.

For the second straight season, beating Massachusetts, the No. 1 team in the nation, could be a good start to a strong finish.

While many in the nation's capital were celebrating, believing that the win assures them a tournament berth, Jarvis warned against getting excited to early.

"This game will not mean anything if we don't beat St. Bonaventure, Rutgers and the other teams we play," Jarvis said. "We need to continue to give the NCAA reasons to remember George Washington on selection day."

The 1994–95 season hasn't always brought a smile to Jarvis's face.

After their second consecutive trip, to the NCAA's last year, GW looked to have a solid nucleus returning led by sophomore Yinka Dare. However before fans in D.C. had a chance to dream about the future, Dare dropped a bombshell.

The center declared himself eligible for the NBA draft, where he was selected by the New Jersey Nets.

Without Dare the team's stock fell considerably in the minds of most experts.

The Colonials opened up their season with an 111–104 overtime upset of Syracuse in the pre–season National Invitational Tournament, and opened the season 5–1, before getting thrashed 103–73 by Duke.

Since then GW has been barely above .500 going 8–7 entering the UMass game.

"This season has been a roller coaster," Jarvis said. "Right now we're on top. I don't know where we're going next. We've had so much greatness, but we've had some bad losses to."

The win meant more to Jarvis because he is a native of the Bay State.

"The fact that it's Massachusetts and that my mother and family still live in Massachusetts, the fact that at the Ebony Club, where the brothers hang out were all watching the game today, makes it really extra special," Jarvis said. "I hope that when the Cambridge Rindge and Latin (where Jarvis used to coach) kids go to school on Monday, that they will talk about GW and how their ex–coach and a former player (Omo Moses) won this game."

Weekend hockey results disappointing

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Boston University and the University of New Hampshire flexed their considerable hockey muscle in 5–1 and 7–1 defeats of the University of Massachusetts at the Mullins Center this weekend.

BU	5
UMass	1

"We can't sneak up on anyone now," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said of his team that stunned No. 1 Maine last Saturday here. UMass could only hope to find a way to sneak out of the building in these lopsided tilts.

Hobey Baker candidate Eric Flinton gave UNH a 1–0 lead just 32 seconds into yesterday's contest, depositing the rebound of Kent Schmidtke's point drive. Ted Russell, who shadowed Rob Bonneau and broke up a pair of 3–on–2 breakaways, also picked up an assist.

Flinton got the gate for hooking at 7:57, but Dale Hooper followed for boarding at 8:08. But UMass had little chance of improving its strikingly anemic power play on this night, as the stingy Wildcats entered the game with a streak of 36 consecutive penalties killed. UMass went 0–for–7 on the power play, but also kept UNH off the scoreboard on five man advantages.

Standing right in front of goaltender Brian Regan (42 saves), Eric Boguniecki converted a gorgeous centering pass from left winger Rob Gagnon at 15:22 of the first period. Steve Pleau added an assist on Boguniecki's ninth goal of the season.

In the second period UNH doubled its lead in a span of 18 seconds, with Tom O'Brien scoring from Brian Putnam and Dylan Dellezay at 4:45 and Schmidtke making it 4–0 at 5:03 from freshman phenom Mark Mowers and Eric Royal, Hockey East's Player of the Month for January.

Pleau's shot deflected off Tom O'Connor's skate, past Regan at 10:52 with O'Brien off for slashing, making it UNH's ninth shorthanded goal of the year.

The line of Gagnon, Pleau and Boguniecki connected twice more, as Boguniecki got his second of the night on a 2–on–1 at 11:32 of the third period with both his linemates assisting.

Gerry Cahill denied Mike Heinke's shutout bid with his first goal of the season at 13:48, a near shorthanded backhander that Bonneau and Keith O'Connell assisted.

Pleau tallied the best–executed goal of the game at 18:08, scoring from Regan's right off two great passes

A-10 looks to add three more teams

Dayton, Virginia Tech are almost definite, with LaSalle likely

The Atlantic 12?

That could be the case as the Atlantic 10 conference appears to be expanding yet again.

The conference will reportedly add Virginia Tech and Dayton to its ranks within the next two weeks, with LaSalle likely to follow shortly after.

The added members would allow the Atlantic 10 to adopt a two–division format within the conference, similar to the format currently in place in the Southeastern Conference.

"This will allow our teams to play less conference games," said A–10 Commissioner Linda Bruno. "Our coaches have been very good about scheduling top level non–conference games."

The Atlantic 10 began actively seeking expansion when current members Rutgers and West Virginia announced that they would be departing from the conference to join the Big East, leaving the A–10 with only seven teams committed for the 1995–96 season.

The conference added Xavier and Fordham to bring the total number back to nine institutions.

It was speculated that Virginia Tech would have joined sooner, but the A–10 was waiting for the Hokies to settle a legal dispute with their former league, the Metro Conference.

"We waited until some issues were settled," Bruno said, "and we'll make some decisions within the next two weeks."

Dayton, who has long been considered a possibility for A– 10 expansion will be leaving the Great Midwest Conference.

LaSalle, who was thought to covet a spot in the Atlantic 10, recently announced that it would not be returning to the Midwestern Collegiate Conference. The Atlantic 10 appears to be its next home, but the Metro Atlantic Conference was also a slim possibility.

Bruno acknowledged that, while she believed the new institutions would help the conference through-78–67.

That was the score three weeks ago when the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team travelled to Piscataway, N.J. and stole their first ever win from the Rutgers Lady Knights.

The Minutewomen trailed 36–22 at the break, but caught fire in the second half, opening up the period with a 21–9 run that pulled them within two. When sophomore point guard Sabriya Mitchell nailed a three pointer with 5:50 remaining in the game, UMass took the lead for the first time.

Coach Joanie O'Brien's Minutewomen then used two trifectas from sophomore Beth Kuzmeski, who scored 18 points in the matchup, to sail to the victory over Rutgers. Rutgers is perennially one of the teams to beat in the Atlantic 10. The Lady Knights had owned victories in all of the two teams' previous 23 meetings.

Tonight at the Mullins Center (7 p.m. tipoff), the two teams will clash for the second time this season. Barring a matchup in the postseason, they will also meet for the last time as league rivals, as Rutgers will wave goodbye to the Atlantic 10 for the greener pastures of the Big East after this year.

The Lady Knights will enter tonight's contest a disappointing 9–11 overall, 5–4 in A–10 play. Rutgers, who was the consensus to finish second in the A–10 in the preseason, currently stands fifth in the league but does possess a big 74–73 win over the No. 18 nationally ranked Colonial Women of George Washington at the Louis Brown Athletic Center in N.J. The loss to Rutgers is the only conference loss GW has suffered this season.

Clinton throws out ultimatum in baseball strike

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton gave baseball one more day to settle its strike after mediator W.J. Usery said Monday he needed more time to complete his own proposal to end the 179-day walkout.

The president hoped the additional time would allow players and owners to settle things themselves, but there appeared to be little hope.

"On this 100th anniversary of Babe Ruth's birth, the Babe would not be enormously optimistic for any quick settlement right now," Labor Secretary Robert Reich said after Clinton extended the deadline.

Usery, a former Labor Secretary appointed to mediate by Clinton last Oct. 14, said he would again try to cajole the sides into a voluntary solution.

"I refuse to be pessimistic," Usery said, "although it is very difficult to seem to find a voluntary agreement between the parties."

Usery has led the sides through six rounds of negotiations with little movement.

"He didn't want to leave any stone unturned," Reich said, "didn't want to really risk not thinking of and not giving both parties a full opportunity for resolving this dispute. The president agreed to wait until 3 p.m. tomorrow for former secretary Usery's final report and recommendation."

Neither side knew what Clinton would do if they rejected the plan.

The president could propose special legislation to enact terms of a settlement or binding arbitration, but both types of bills would have to be approved by the House and Senate.

"Certainly from public comments by members of Congress, we sense that they share the president's sense of frustration that the strike has continued for too long," White House spokesman Mike McCurry said. "We detect among many members of Congress a desire to see baseball get back on the boards for 1995."

Near the end of his news conference, Usery dropped a hint that his plan might become legislation.

"When you have to write a recommendation that goes to the president of the United States and may be used other ways, it takes a lot of time to do that," he said.

Usery said he began his day at 4:30 a.m., three hours after going to sleep, but still couldn't finish his proposal in time.

"After discussions with the parties, and especially with the player representatives, I felt it incumbent upon me that I spend some more time talking with them," Usery said.

"Not only have I listened them out, I listened them out very much today, including carrying a letter to the president that the players had given me," he said.

Clinton had demanded a settlement or progress by Monday, the 179th day of the strike.

"They're working at least," Clinton said before meeting Usery. "I just keep telling them to play ball.

"It's just a few hundred folks trying to figure out how to divide nearly $2 billion. They ought to be able to figure that out," Clinton said.

Both sides thought Clinton was the only one with the ability to force a quick end to the mess.

Hours after presenting a $1.61 trillion budget to Congress, the president found himself in the middle of a dispute that has disturbed fans for half a year.

Owners also demanded salary caps during negotiations in 1985 and 1990, but commissioners Peter Ueberroth and Fay Vincent forced them to push those plans aside. The dispute cost Vincent his job 2 years ago and left players with no one to turn to other than the government and the courts.

Marchers expected from across Northeast to memorialize Schoolfield

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Organizations from all over the Northeast, and as far away as Chicago, will be marching alongside Schoolfield's family and friends in an effort to put pressure on officials who are responsible for the case–investigation, according to Chelan Jenkins, one of the organizers of the February 7th Coalition.

The Coalition consists of different organizations and area activists who claim to be working against "unwarranted police violence," Jenkins said. There is a busload of people coming in from Chicago to today's 6 p.m. protest.

"We expect to make a strong impact," Jenkins said. "Marches we've held in the past year have been made up of family, friends and concerned citizens. This time there will be outside groups attending."

A substantial portion of the people taking part in today's march are affiliated with the International Socialist Organization (ISO), Jenkins said. The ISO–affiliated group at the University of Massachusetts held a symposium for the Coalition last semester, at which Schoolfield's sister, Jamie Schoolfield–Lyles, spoke of her brothers murder.

Schoolfield–Lyles, all three of Schoolfield's brothers and, for the first time since her sons death, Schoolfield's mother, will all be attending the march, according to Jenkins.

None of the UMass groups intending to participate were able to be contacted.

Umoja, a student group at Hampshire College, geared towards "unity" will be attending, according to Lorenzo Gaines, a junior politics–and–power major and close friend of Schoolfield.

"It's a way to bring attention to a national crisis of police brutality, and an opportunity for people with a common interest, or cause, to unite," Gaines said.

"It's a way to bring attention to a national crisis of police brutality, and an opportunity for people with a common interest, or cause, to unite," Gaines said.

On Feb. 7, 1994, Springfield Officer Donald Brown allegedly shot Schoolfield for operating a stolen vehicle. It was later determined that the vehicle was not stolen, but Brown was not reprimanded, according to Jenkins.

None of the five people that witnessed the crime were asked to testify in front of an all–white jury, and there were rumors of an interdepartmental party held for Brown for a "job well done" shortly after Schoolfields death.

The Coalition has been posting fliers about the rally for the past two months, Jenkins said.

Lawyers will be in attendance in case there is any violence or harassment.

"In the past year we've held marches where police have beat kids up," Jenkins said. The march is intended to be a peaceful demonstration.

Plan for Progress targets Pioneer Valley economy

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

Since January of 1994, the University of Massachusetts has helped play a vital role in projecting the Pioneer Valley's economic landscape.

The Plan for Progress, a regional effort intending to create opportunity in a "series of objectives, is a collaborative effort between the public and private sectors," according to Dr. William Roberts.

Roberts is the the plan's co–chair and vice president of SpringBoard Technology in Springfield.

"The University and higher education are a tremendous asset in the Pioneer Valley," Brennan said. "UMass has been a critical linchpin."

The Pioneer Valley has many aspects that can be explored which will help the economy, said Jaymie Chernoff, director of the UMass office of economic development.

"The Plan for Progress offers the University a great opportunity to integrate itself with the region," Chernoff said.

"By understanding more of the needs and opportunities in the region we can apply our resources more strategically," he said.

One positive quality the region has going for it includes "the beauty of the valley," he said.

The Connecticut River, for example, was cited as a resource of recreation.

It was also cited as an area where UMass environmental sciences can technologically help clean up.

Expanding regional tourism, one strategy where UMass will have an impact is a role to be undertaken by the department of hotel, restaurant and travel administration, Chernoff said.

UMass is the largest employer of the four counties of Western Massachusetts, Chernoff said. The University draws $60 million from the outside, most of which is awarded by the federal government for graduate and undergraduate study.

J. Lynn Griesemer, the associate vice president of economic development for the entire UMass system, called the plan a "potential incubator" for new businesses to start.

"We are looking at retaining and helping to grow existing businesses as well as assisting the creation of new businesses," Griesemer said.

Roberts, who coordinates the private sector role, said the results will be seen in short–term, mid–term and long–term stages.

The Plan for Progress is now more than one year old and separated into 19 strategies, all recognized and praised Gov. William Weld, Roberts said.

The 19 strategies make up components that will restructure the region's economy, according to Tim Brennan.

This will position the Pioneer Valley to successfully compete into the next century, according to Brennan, who is the other co–chair of the Pioneer Valley Planning Committee.Brennan's responsibility is to organize the public sector.

UMass is slated to play a role in approximately 10 of the 19 strategies, according to the Chernoff.

Campus Center looks to revamp food services

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Food Services will be changing their look and menus in the up–coming months in an attempt to regain its popularity with the students.

According to Adam Silverman, a recent graduate who works for the University of Massachusetts Food Services, the Hatch will be trying to gear itself more toward the students.

"I'm trying to make it more of the hangout," said Silverman. "It used to be the place to be."

The first change to the Hatch is the addition of a fast–food Mexican counter called T–Mex, which stands for Total Mexican.

Silverman said the T–Mex menu has burritos, from beef to vegetarian, tacos and chili. More will be added as the semester goes on.

"We're trying to give quality food at an inexpensive price," Silverman said.

T–Mex is currently in operation, but the grand–opening is scheduled for Feb. 16, said Roberta Potter, interim manager for Campus Center food services.

Silverman said he would like to see more live entertainment at The Hatch Bar. There are two events slotted for this week, including a live band and D.J. dancing for 18 and up. Alcohol will still be served for people 21 and up.

"We used to have live entertainment, but we ran out of money," said Potter. "People think because we're on a college campus we can find a bunch of high quality entertainment for free — unfortunately that's not true."

Potter said they are attempting to have at least one night of entertainment a week at the bar.

This past year, the Hatch Bar stopped serving mixed drinks, and switched to serving beer only. Potter said this was also due to a money factor.

"We looked at what we sold, 20–to–1 beer outsold mixed drinks," said Potter. "Plus you need a very well–trained staff."

The Top of the Campus Bar (TOC) and the Graduate Student lounge are still serving mixed drinks, she said.

"We're looking into turning the TOC into a sports bar," said Potter. "We already get a tremendous amount of business in the lounge on game nights."

The TOC restaurant is currently closed for dinner, due to costs. "It's a Student jobs available at admissions center

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Walking around the University of Massachusetts campus can mean valuable experience in public relations.

The admissions office is currently offering jobs in public relations to student applicants. Positions include University tour guides, student admissions representatives and new student program counselors, according to Richard Toomey, admissions advisor for undergraduate admissions.

"Students are the most popular aspect of admissions with possible students and parents, because they live the life," Toomey said.

"[The students] are the front door, an integral part of decisions of whether to attend the University," he said.

The experience working for admissions is useful in future careers, according to Toomey.

"These jobs look amazing on a resume," Toomey said.

"My job with admissions when I was at the University helped me get a job after graduation," he said.

Students working in admissions learn important people and organizational skills because they are working in public relations and interacting with so many prospective students and parents, Toomey said.

The office will hire about 10 new tour guides and fill 25 positions each, for new student programs and admission representatives this semester, the advisor said.

"We are accepting applications for the fall 1995 semester now because students need to prepare for upcoming work," Toomey said.

New student programs run from May 30 to July 19, according to Toomey.

"The new student counselors are a combination of live–in resident assistants and academic counselors," Toomey said.

The tour guides and admissions representatives work from the admissions office. Student tour guides at the University interact with 20,000 different people through the period of a year, Toomey said.

Information programs for parents and students are conducted by the admission representatives, said Shelby Gile, sophomore and College of Arts and Sciences major.

Gile is a student admissions representative and tour guide.

"Student representation is very important," she said. "Perspective students can get firsthand knowledge from someone who has experienced life at UMass," Gile said.

The job is very rewarding, according to her. "I think it is great to be able to get across what UMass is about.

"I love the job, especially talking with students who may decide to come to UMass. It is exciting to see someone from a spring tour on their way to class on campus in the fall," Gile said.

year of frugality," Potter said.

She said lunch is still being served and every Wednesday for the month of February, students on the meal plan can use their I.D. to get a $3 discount.

She said they will decide if the TOC will continue the student discount when they re-evaluate later this month.

The Campus Center is going to try to add a professional ice cream business to the Bluewall over the summer.

"Maybe a Bart's or a Ben and Jerry's at the opposite end of the Bluewall," Potter said.

Being a state institution, however, Potter said it is not easy getting the new business in the cafe, as they have to go through the government.

Potter said she was very happy with the addition of the gourmet coffee at the Bluewall, but not enough people are aware of the quality coffee they use.

"We haven't done a good job letting people know what good coffee we have," said Potter. "It's expensive [to run], but it's worth it."

She said the Bluewall has unintentionally become a cafe with a study atmosphere, but it is becoming hard to find a place to sit, especially around lunch time.

"We're working on getting more tables, chairs and couches for places to sit," Potter said.

Overall, Potter said she would like to see the Campus Center become the popular student hang-out it used to be.

"A lot of us who work here, went here, and it used to the place to be at night, even after the Bluewall was no longer a bar," she said. "We like to see ourselves as the living room of the University."

Thursday night the Hatch Bar will be featuring live funk with Yolk, and a rave Friday night.

UMass grad opens takeout restaurant

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — There is now an inexpensive healthy restaurant in Amherst for people on the go.

Robert Lowry, a University of Massachusetts marketing graduate, recently opened Bueno y Sano, a restaurant specializing in burritos and tacos.

Lowry said he got the idea while visiting Tacos Tacos of Nantucket.

"The place in Nantucket was packed and they were charging $6," Lowry said. "But we charge around $3.25 a burrito and ours are better."

While driving through Amherst center in October, Lowry thought that a take out Mexican restaurant in the empty Uptown Pizza store front would be an excellent idea. When he contacted the realtor about the site, McDonald's had already placed a bid, Lowry said.

After graduating in May 1993, Lowry returned to his family's home in Andover, and worked a year at the State Street Bank in Boston. He opened the restaurant with money he had saved from working at the bank, he said.

The popularity of Mexican restaurants began in California, Lowry said. He compared the popularity of tacos and burritos to other items like snowboards and mountain bikes which also began in California.

Lowry's attitude about the restaurant is reflected in its name, which means "good and healthy" in Spanish.

"I pay a lot of attention to health which was aspired by being a member on the UMass crew team," Lowry said.

Bueno y Sano only uses fresh top quality ingredients and is prepared daily, Lowry said. The food is quick and low fat, he said.

He said the tortillas come from highly acclaimed Maria and Ricardo's of Jamaica Plains in Boston. The salsa is from local Hot Mama's Salsa in Amherst.

"Burritos are easy and inexpensive to make," Lowry said.

The menu goes beyond simple burritos and tacos, and includes various other Mexican specialties like chili and nachos. The menu also includes several vegetarian alternatives.

The prices are also economical for students on a budget, Lowry said. Prices start as low as $1 for a soft taco.

If students do not want to brave the cold weather and head into town, Lowry offers free delivery for any order over $5 to anywhere in Amherst.

Unfortunately there is no seating because of town zoning, but that will change next month, Lowry said.

"I may have 16 seats by Feb. 16," Lowry said.

Bueno y Sano is located on 1 Boltwood Ave. next to Bananarama.

Workshop to discuss GLBs in workplace

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

As an increasing number of openly gay, lesbian, and bisexual people enter in the workplace, many of these employees face special challenges and experiences because of their sexuality.

The Department of Human Resources is taking steps to address these topics in a workshop developed by the Training and Development Unit.

Part of the spring/summer 1995 employee education program, the workshop is being offered to University faculty, staff and other employees. Participation is open to gays, lesbians and bisexuals as well as heterosexuals interested in finding out more about GLBs in the workplace.

Wednesday's workshop, facilitated by training and development intern Dvora Zipkin, will allow participants the opportunity to discuss and share experiences, successes and challenges faced by GLBs in a work environment. Zipkin is a doctoral student in the creativity program of the UMass School of Education.

After sharing information, workshop participants will discuss ways to decrease isolation and reach out to fellow GLBs and heterosexual colleagues.

"Being LGB in the Workplace" will also outline ways GLB employees can work to create safer and more supportive work environments.

To be held on Feb. 8 the workshop is entitled "Being Lesbian, Gay or Bisexual in the Workplace: Supporting Each Other." The workshop will take place from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m. in room 811B-15, Campus Center.

Participation is limited to University faculty, staff and employees who register in advance with the Training and Development Unit.

Problems solved in one easy step

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

One phone call to the University of Massachusetts dean of students office can help solve mix-ups with various offices on campus.

In the event that administrative problems snowball, the dean's office has a system by which UMass students can receive assistance.

A coordinated triage approach is used by the dean of students office to assist students who have problems linked to different administrative offices.

Problems at the bursar's office, the registrar's office and housing can be taken care of through the dean's office.

With this approach, students do not have to visit separate offices, according to Eileen Stewart, assistant dean of students.

"The dean of students' office offers one-stop shopping for students," Stewart said. "If a student had more than one problem in the past, he or she would be sent to different offices which cannot take care of the problem alone."

The dean's office can deal with students or parents who call with more than one problem, Stewart said. In most cases, one office cannot clear a problem independently until the mix-up has been taken care of by another office.

For example, there may be a problem with a bill-clearing, which may affect financial aid, Stewart said.

"The dean of students' office takes the problem and knows exactly where to start, with what office, and with whom," Stewart said.

In effect, the problems are reversed more quickly, which relieves students, she said.

"Students that come to the registrar's office with issues that go beyond one office are directed to the dean's office," said Nancy Fitzpatrick, registrar. "The system works well and gets students out of lines."

Students were on their own before the triage program, without a mediator to deal with separate offices, according to Stewart.

"Students and parents usually don't know where to start or who to contact in order to solve their problem," she said.

Through the triage approach students can get help fixing what is broken without becoming frustrated and helpless.

"The program takes some of the burden off the student by giving individual attention and following through," Fitzpatrick said.

The approach is now in its second year and has not been highly publicized, according to Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin, associate vice chancellor and dean of students. "Students are generally referred to us by different offices when there is a roadblock," Vanin said. "We encourage more students to come to us on their own. We do not want any student to go unserviced."

Sometimes getting through by phone is also an obstacle, according to Stewart.

"Some of the offices are still trying to get technologically up to speed," she said. "When parents or students contact our office with a problem, they are thrilled just to speak with a human."

Bartering network enhances community

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

In November 1991, the University women's network at the University of Massachusetts created a bartering network to ease the burden and financial strain on area women.

The women decided to exchange goods and services they needed but could not afford. Program creator Gurunam Khalsa says local currency is important because lack of money "shouldn't stop good things from happening."

The group, then called University women's network resource pool, originally offered services such as cooking, babysitting, errands, sewing and computer training.

Five months after its origin, the group asked friends and associates to join. As University information systems training and support manager and e-mail administrator, Khalsa was able to tell others about the network. This expanded the pool of goods and services offered and changed the composition of the group. It became a network including men and non-University members, and the name was changed to the Valley Trade Connection.

How it works

According to Khalsa, when someone joins the network he or she is given 50 "Valley Dollars." That person identifies what they like to do and what they are capable of and makes those services or crafts available.

For each transaction, a person can pay either entirely or partially with "Valley Dollars." Prices are at the discretion of the person offering the service or craft.

UMass doctoral student Tim Mitchell has made the VTC a part of his studies.

He became involved through VISTA, the American equivalent to the Peace Corps and the Franklin County Community Development Corps.

Mitchell says there are five basic reasons for the network. Bartering creates new jobs, develops new markets, makes the Pioneer Valley more self reliant, produces new wealth and enhances community.

People can use their hobbies and interests to earn money, and unemployed and underemployed people can create their own jobs.

New markets are created by people coming up with new services to offer and businesses attract new customers by allowing people to pay partially or in full for services with "Valley Dollars."

Bartering taps more local resources and talents and eliminates the need to transport goods from outside the area. The new wealth created is recycled within the community. The currency exchanged is worthless outside the Valley, so every "dollar" earned and spent stays in the Pioneer Valley.

Bartering "creates community because trade is on a person to person basis," Mitchell said.

Making progress

Last summer Khalsa visited Ithaca, N.Y. where there is a bartering network with over 1,000 participants and $50,000 in local currency. She says since the trip she sees how the VTC could expand and has thus "changed the parameters and scope of the network."

Currently the VTC is printing new currency and preparing to expand the programs with grant and loan programs. There are 100 members and ten businesses involved, but Khalsa says she expects those numbers to double or triple.

On March 4, the VTC is planning to have a kickoff event where members will showcase their crafts.

Eileen Harris, chair of the event and secretary to the dean of the School of Nursing, said the event will help the network attract "more people to join and more services to choose from."

Creating a new plan for America

New Covenant Associates has been the victim of a hostile takeover by Empowerment, Inc., an Atlanta–based firm that has just moved into its new offices in Washington, D.C. The CEO of Empowerment is Newton Leroy Gingrich; New Covenant head Bubba J. Clinton stays on as junior partner.

The two chief executives have a lot in common. They are both family values moralists with questionable morals themselves: Newt dropped his wife as a political liability when she got cancer; in his spare time, he writes sex thrillers. Bubba has slept with some of the biggest names in Hollywood, and only executive privilege has kept him out of court in a sexual harassment case.

Newt tried to legalize pot; Bubba smoked it. Both are highly educated, cultured intellectuals who have cynically masked their true personas for political gain. Both are former progressives who sold out at election time.

It is not surprising, then, that Newt and Bubba quickly arrived at a course of action for Empowerment, Inc. They call it the "Contract On America."

1. Because the United States faces less threat of direct attack than at any other time in its history, and because social problems swell like a virus, it logically follows that social spending be cut, and defense spending increased.

2. In an effort to roll back the Big Government welfare schemes of the past 30 years, children will be taken from their parents by government agents and placed in state–run orphanages.

3. There is only one member of our highest legislative body, Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado, who has ancestors whom did not immigrate here within the past 500 years. Even so, real Americans — folks with names like Kilpatrick, Muller, Santopietro and Pulaski — demand that the borders be sealed. The Mexican hordes, destitute victims of NAFTA and Salinas, will be repelled to save the Republic.

4. The problems of our youth can only be solved through education. That is, the elimination thereof. Plans to issue computers to schools have already been aborted, a sizeable number of House Republicans want to privatize education, and Newt has Big Bird in the sights of his shotgun as he hunts down PBS.

5. Initial fears that Empowerment would cut off all foreign aid have proven to be an exaggeration. Never fear: Newt and Bubba are merely eliminating humanitarian aid. America will still back up the peso and the corrupt government of Mexico. Petty dictators will still make a buck. Bubba will be allowed to continue his pet project of giving U.S. support to that prison camp called the People's Republic of China.

6. Empowerment, Inc., vows to wipe out the threat of single–payer health care. House members suffer the horror of fully subsidized, guaranteed medical coverage themselves, and will do their best to keep others from the same awful fate.

7. If Bubba gets his way, American workers will be empowered with a minimum wage increase to a whopping $206 for a 40–hour week at McDonald's. Adjusted for inflation, that is less than workers made at the start of the Reagan era. For those who do not want to work, don't worry: Empowerment, Inc., fully supports the efforts of Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan to wipe out employment altogether.

8. Empowerment will combine efforts at crime prevention and moral re–education by issuing Respectable Citizen status to all White, middle–income males who hate art museums. White, middle–income females will be subject to house arrest under Good Housewife status; all others will be arrested or deported.

9. "Art" will be officially redefined as positive portrayals of American life, values and our Christian tradition. Any painting that is not by Norman Rockwell will be used as kindling at the next public burning of a welfare mother.

10. Empowerment, Inc., will add the First Amendment to that flame by mandating moments of prayer in public schools. Empowerment believes that we all must pray for the future of our nation. But Newt and Bubba can rest assured that every church and synagogue will be packed; as long as their Contract On America is in effect, we all have a lot to pray for.

Self–loathing in modern rock & roll

Questions: Am I the only one who thinks that the sweater Kurt Cobain wore on "MTV Unplugged" bears a startling similarity to a Chia pet? And is this the beginning of a Chia apparel line of active wear?

"I hate myself and want to die." This, along with being a prophetic statement on a Cobain T–shirt, is also an appropriate label for the low self–esteem rock movement of the '90s, ushered in primarily by acts such as Nirvana. Rock historians will no longer refer to grunge, a descriptive term based largely on flannel clothing, but to alienation and self– loathing.

A. J. Stewart

This era has a distinct startling point, the release of "Smells like Teen Spirit" from the album Nevermind. One lyric tells the story: "I feel stupid and contagious."

Today, perhaps in response to the millions of album sales for Nevermind, musicians have revealed their faults and self–hatred. You have the Offspring wailing (like a wounded dog) the line "I'm just a sucker with low self esteem." The band Radiohead screams "I'm a creep, I'm a weirdo. What the hell am I doing here? I don't belong here." The song this lyric comes from is also telling. The title "Creep" has been given to no fewer than three popular singles over the past two years, not including TLC's latest release (they use it as a verb). It is clear that the bubble gum days of "Good Vibrations" from the Beach Boys are long gone; artists feel compelled to sing about more than women and cars, two traditional staples of rock and roll.

Why are trends in music important, you ask? Let's look at this campus as an example. It mirrors the society in that there seems to be a pattern of dispute and controversy. It is very difficult to get the people here to agree on anything. But music is a unifying force for young people on this campus, and in actuality, across the country and the globe.

Clearly, music is one of the most influential and accessible creative endeavors of the '90s. To see this illustrated, most students here know the name of the latest Pearl Jam CD. But how many know the title of James Michener's last novel? Or can name any modern sculptor or painter? Unless one is either a book worm or an art major, the chances are slim that a person could answer these questions. While tastes differ widely, there is little debate over music's cultural importance.

The problem with the self–loathing trend is the number of young people who identify with these musicians words. Rock and roll music doesn't make people kill themselves. It is suicidal people that relate to and embrace the guilt, hatred and fear these tortured artists produce. Nine Inch Nails' popularity lies almost entirely with their ability to express pain and turmoil. Music should not be blamed or praised for influencing behavior, but instead should be seen as the societal mirror that it is. Taken in this light, the '90s musical trend of self–loathing and low self–esteem is depressing and troublesome.

Are all people who listen to Nirvana suicidal? Of course not. Nirvana was a great band, and the fact that they had dark themes does not preclude stable people from enjoying them. However, the sheer number of artists recording brooding, dark albums indicates that something is going on here. Perhaps most listeners aren't suicidal.

But there are many who have come to believe that they lead meaningless lives, that their actions serve no purpose, and that no one cares about them. It is these people who struggle to get through their days, who don't see much reason to be happy, and who are destined to be forever miserable unless they can find meaning in their lives. As it stands now, these people are already dead.

The problem is not that musicians are expressing their self–loathing. The concern is that so many young people are attracted to this genre primarily because they can relate to those feelings of alienation. The solution is for people to understand that young people feel this way, and to care about them. Perhaps if compassion and concern had existed prior to now, youth wouldn't have wanted to destroy itself.

Cyberspace knows no boundaries

Queers have taken over the Internet.

Actually many groups have established "turf" out in cyberspace. Punks. Skaters. Trekkies. Biochemists. Politicians. Anarchists. You name it, and there's a newsgroup, gopher or some kind of list for it — all you need is a community or a common interest.

My interest is queers. I use the Internet quite a bit, so a few days ago I started looking for them. I entered the main UMass gopher, the main menu that links you to resources and directories all over the Internet. After a bit of hunting, I found a screen that let me type in keywords.

Not skipping a beat, I typed in "queer." A few seconds went by as the connection went through. The red light on my TAU flashed sporadically. I leaned back in my chair, thinking maybe my search was going to amount to nothing.

Then it happened.

There on the screen was a listing of not just one, but almost 150 queer gophers and directories. Seems like every gay, lesbian and bisexual has staked out a place in cyberspace.

Wendy Darling

I did a double–take. How was it possible that a novice like me could have access to such privileged information? It could take months or even years to collect all that information on my own, but there it was, everything from "queer parents" to "race in queer politics" to "Kansas campus queer groups" to "local queer radio shows."

Some of the information was more obscure — when will I really need to know about queer life in Sweden? — but the idea that I could have it if I wanted to was mind–boggling. I could sit in my dorm room and find out about things happening to people like me and my friends all over the world. Politics. Music. Fashion. Psychological research. Anything.

I realize that the so–called information highway isn't the most accessible of resources. It's not like a telephone directory, a book, a magazine or a campus student group. You need a computer or a terminal. Often there is money involved. You need to get an account. You have to learn how to use it. This cuts off a lot of people — the poor and the technologically illiterate, for instance.

On the other hand, the Internet can be a fantastic resource for those who are already on it. For instance, I can find out what queer activists are doing at the University of California at Berkeley. It doesn't cost me a phone call or time hunting in a book to get the student group's address or the airfare to get to California. I just pay my yearly fee ($20), get my TAU, turn on my computer, and press a few buttons.

Besides being a great way to retrieve information, the Internet is also a tool for spreading it. I can get the e–mail address of students at Berkeley and send them message to tell them about what students here are doing.

Soon the UMass Program for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Concerns will be starting up its own services on the UMass gopher that will let people know the scoop on all kinds of GLB issues and resources. Queer freshmen — and anybody else, for that matter — can hook up to the system and say "Queers have taken over the Internet!" They can get connected and get involved.

Information will spread, and knowledge will increase.

And knowledge is power.

So more power to the Internet.

Film shows needed perspectives

To the editor:

This letter is in defense of our dear brother's new film Higher Learning. It certainly cannot be denied that Brother John Singleton, spring '87, University of Southern California, is a gifted filmmaker whose talents have certainly been the subject of much criticism in this publication; furthermore, it is certainly acceptable for criticism to be rendered for it is the nature of his chosen profession.

We wish to express the fact that any point of debate concerning this film's rating should not be dependent upon the idea that the film may be unrealistic to some, or the belief that most of its characters were not well portrayed, but with its success in achieving its mission (i.e. exposing most people's inability to come to grips with what is real and what is not).

The meat of the gray area in this thought is that everyone has a different impression of reality on a whole. This can be substantiated by looking at the diversity of opinions concerning issues which are real in America today or for that matter, have been a part of America's wretched past. Issues such as slavery, voting rights, civil rights, immigration, abortion, anti–Semitism, racism, gangster rap, welfare and social security, are still being debated by the democratic minority and the republican majority in Congress today.

The key here is to see that, on each of these issues and many more, Republicans don't see things the same way as Democrats, most women don't share the same point of view as most men, and certainly most members of minority groups fail to find common ground with the power–wielding majority. It has been the continuum of U.S. history that minorities have had to make their voices heard, and spark debate in order to perpetuate the beginnings of fruitful change if nothing else.

Aside from any of the issues or scenes depicted in the film, which various groups might find debatable, the point is the following: Singleton, who happens to be a member of a minority group here in the United States, attempted and succeeded in telling a fictional story from an African–American perspective in order to spark debate and perpetuate the beginnings of change if nothing else.

The criticism expressed in your paper concerning this film is evidence of the film's success in achieving its purpose, which is good. To our Brother Singleton, Phi Nupe!

Earth Day needs new leadership

To the editor:

Students from across the country have recognized the environmental crisis that we face as a generation, and are ready to do something about it. Over 1,000 campus leaders from all 50 states have come together to call for an Emergency Campus Environmental Conference to be held the weekend of Feb. 24–26 in Philadelphia.

In 1970, students led the first Earth Day celebration which mobilized 10,000 schools, 2,000 colleges and universities, and virtually every community in the United States to demonstrate their concern for the environment. That effort brought national recognition to the seriousness of our environmental problems and led to the passage of some of our most vital environmental reforms.

Now it is the 25th Anniversary of Earth Day, and things have changed. Earth Day has been taken over by corporate polluters who are growing tougher and more mean spirited as our planet grows more fragile and endangered. Our political leadership has continually refused to take action on our environmental problems. The environment now faces a direct attack from the 104th Congress who has signed a "Contract on America" to roll back virtually all of our environmental protections.

Students must stop the trend of environmental destruction and call for the preservation of the planet. We must reclaim Earth Day and refocus it on its original mission of grassroots action and service. The emergency Campus Environmental Conference is a step of a new campaign called Earth Day 1995: Free the Planet. At the conference students will plan to begin a grassroots campaign to prove that Earth Day 1995 is about action.

The campaign to free the planet does not end at Earth Day. There is a fight ahead if we are to free the planet from the special interest politics that threaten to undermine our basic environmental protections. Earth Day 1995 will serve as a launching pad for a continuing campaign to demand corporate and congressional accountability and legislative change.

UMass thespians to perform at the ACTF regional semi–finals

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

It is only through hard work and persistent dedication toward a crowning pinnacle of achievement that success can truly be had. The University of Massachusetts theater department knows this because for the second time they have been chosen to compete in the regional phase of the American College Theater Festival with the play Escape From Happiness, by George F. Walker.

Directed by UMass Professor Edward Golden, Escape From Happiness is a dark comedy about three sisters who travel back to their childhood home to try to fix the injuries left by an abandoning father when they were children.

"This is a play about a real family," said Golden in a recent press release. "There's a love that flows deep underneath that makes them want to stick together. They're portrayed in a very believable way, and the audience responds to that."

Two of the shows actresses, Robyn Bruderick and Marissa Matrone, are also in contention for the Irene Ryan Scholarship, a national award for excellence in acting.

The regional competition will be held at Regis College in Weston, Mass. The play will compete against shows from Wellesley College, Harvard–Radcliff Dramatic Club, Boston University, Colby College, Middlebury College and Bridgewater State College.

"Regional festivals are held in eight different locations," said Lisa Danforth, director of publicity at the UMass theater department. "The way it works is a school has a play run during normal season and adjudicators are invited to see the play at the school. The adjudicators then invite the school to the ACTF regionals. Whether or not their invited is the first step. UMass is at that step, we were invited."

This is not the first time that the theater department has excelled to such a high extent under Golden's directing skills. In 1961's Playboy of the Western World by John Millington Synge won the regional competition and sent them to Washington, D.C. to compete in the nationals.

"In 1991 the national adjudicators went to the eight regionals and only four plays were then chosen to go on to the Kennedy Center and compete in the nationals," said Danforth.

Escape From Happiness will be performed at the KC/ACTF regional on February 23 at 12:30 p.m. and 3:30 p.m. in the Studio Theater at Regis College.

In order to defray the $5,082 cost of sending the play to the regionals, a benefit performance will be held on Feb. 20 at 8 p.m. in the Curtain Theater. Tickets will be $15 and proceeds will go to the show's expenses.

"We may end at the regional or go on. There are pretty high odds, but UMass has made it there already so there are high hopes," said Danforth.

Singers set to 'flirt' at Pearl Street

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

In what seems to be an ongoing series of a capella shows throughout the Valley, the openly gay singing group The Flirtations will take the stage at Pearl Street on Feb. 8.

The Flirtations, who have brought their show to the Valley previously, have earned their reputation as a multicultural gay a capella ensemble that manages to mix high camp with political and social messages. But don't write off these guys as just an a capella group for a select few. The Flirtations have entertained people from all sorts of backgrounds with their flamboyant style and wide musical range.

The band has released their music on albums, such as their 1990 self–titled debut, but are most know for their wildly unpredictable live shows. Known to cover songs as diverse as James Taylor's "Secret O' Life" to Julie Brown's semi– cult hit "The Homecoming Queen's Got A Gun," the group is able to transform any song into something distinctly their own. The members are also known for their entertaining and often uproarious in–between–song banter which ranges from joking with each other to teasing the straight audience members in good fun.

The band recently made its film debut in Jonathan Demme's Academy Award winning picture Philadelphia — a big step up from the days when they would perform their songs on the streets.

On a darker note though, the band will be touring without the talents of one of its founding members, Michael Callen, who died last year of AIDS. Despite the loss of Callen, The Flirations managed to carry on, opting not to try and find someone else, but rather teaching themselves to sing their songs as a quartet.

"We looked for a new fifth person, but we felt Michael's shoes were too big to fill," said group member Aurelio Font, in an issue of The Georgia Straight. "We would have had to find someone who could arrange music, sing like a dream, have a political background and a stage presence."

Still despite the problems that have plagued the group, their career is definitely taking off. Their Pearl Street show should be a dazzlingly display of The Flirtations' unique vocal talents and offbeat sense of humor.

The Flirtations will play Pearl Street on Feb. 8. Contact Pearl Street for more information.

Artist uses shacks to tell stories about life

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Smith College will present artist Beverly Buchanan's "Shackworks, A Sixteen–Year Survey" Feb. 9–April 16. The exhibit is a compilation of sculptures based on the rickety shacks that have become an integral part of Southern countryside throughout this country's history.

Born in Fuquay, N.C., Buchanan first came in contact with tenant farmers and sharecroppers when she toured the countryside with her father, a state agriculture agent. This exposure to the ways of inequality and poverty gave the artist an early perception of how the other half lived and survived.

It is within Buchanan's shacks and seemingly shaky exterior that the real crux of life holds true. Metal siding, wooden boards and rickety roofs, newspaper, copper, tin, aluminum and bottle caps are chronicles of lives rich in survival and the instinctive need to exist against the elements.

African slaves, housing tenant farmers and migrant workers have all housed their culture and development in the shack–like structures, further attesting to the creativity and resourcefulness of minorities who are more often than not face disadvantages in American society.

Buchanan used this facile structure and its inner strength in her artwork. "Shackworks" is a show that spans 16 years of the artist's creations. Working in the beginning of her career with cardboard, clay and foamcore, the walls attest to a more retrospective side of her works.

Twenty–one mixed–media shacks, 19–color pastels, several sculptures of shack inhabitants, documentary photographs and written legends that record both fictitious and real events plus personalities comprise the whole of the exhibit showing off her talent as a storyteller and historian as well as an artist in touch with her environment.

In addition to "Shackworks," a family program entitled "People, Dwellings and Stories" will be held in April enabling children and their families to create their own "shacks" and learn more about the artist's message.

"Beverly Buchanan: Shackworks, A Sixteen–Year Survey" opens at the Smith College of Art Feb. 9 and run until April 16. Hours are Tues., Fri. and Sat., 9:50 a.m.–4 p.m.; Weds and Sun., 12 p.m.–4 p.m.; Thurs. 12 p.m.–8 p.m. Closed on Mondays.

Abdul-Jabbar among HOF inductees

By Trudy Tynan
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, who used his 7-foot-2-inch frame and signature sky hook to become the NBA's all-time leading scorer, leads a list of five men and two women elected to the Basketball Hall of Fame.

Also being installed May 15 are women's stars Anne Donovan and Cheryl Miller, longtime Soviet Coach Aleksandr Gomelsky, late referee Earl Strom and a Minneapolis Lakers combo of coach John Kundla and forward Vern Mikkelsen.

"I am very happy," said Abdul-Jabbar from an Atlanta hotel moments after receiving the Monday morning call from Hall of Fame President Joe O'Brien.

He recalled the first basketball trophy he won, the prize in a three-man Parks Department tournament he played in as an eighth grader at St. Jude's School in New York City.

"At that time; I just hoped basketball would be a way for me to get to college," Abdul-Jabbar said.

"It is, of course, an honor for Kareem to be inducted into the Hall of Fame," said Hall of Famer Jerry West, now executive vice president of basketball operations for the Los Angeles Lakers. "It's also an honor for the Hall to have Kareem as a member. He is without a doubt the most consummate professional I've ever seen."

"Six world championship rings. Six MVP awards. I can't think of anyone who could be more deserving," said Lakers owner Jerry Buss.

There were also 19 All-Star appearances for the man who scored 44,149 points over 1,797 games and blocked 3,189 shots.

From the time Abdul-Jabbar, then known as Lew Alcindor, stepped onto the Power Memorial High School court in New York City in 1961, through his three NCAA championships at UCLA and 20 years in the NBA with Milwaukee and Los Angeles, he dominated the game as few men have.

His high school teams lost six games. His college teams were defeated twice.

"He is the greatest of all time," said Donovan, a 6-foot-8 center who led Old Dominion to the AIAW national championship in 1980 and helped boost the U.S. Women's Olympic team to gold medals in 1984 and 1988.

"I was never one to look at male players and try to imitate them," said Donovan now an assistant coach at Old Dominion. "But I always watched and studied Kareem."

Donovan said as a girl she had no Hall of Fame hopes.

"I've been through the Hall of Fame and part of it in small ways signing balls for the Olympic team," she said. "But I never dreamed I could or would be part of it in this big way."

The first women inductees, Lusia Harris-Stewart, Nera White and Uljana Semjonova, were elected in 1992.

UMass has Donta Bright and Inus Norville. Other than these guys, both teams have questionable benches.

As far as strategy is concerned, both coaches have baffled me. John Calipari has one of the finest front-courts in the land. Why then does he insist on giving Padilla and Williams the green light to launch threes from the cheap seats? I was at the Penn game on Jan. 14 and never understood what exactly UMass' plan was.

It seemed like Calipari wanted intercontinental threes to be shot and missed, and for his big guys to get the offensive rebound and put the ball back in.

I have seen three or four games this season, and not once has UMass established an inside threat despite the abundance of talent at the 4 and 5 spots (that's the power forward and center for all you uneducated basketball fanatics). If the Minutemen were to use a similar plan against UConn, they would get their proverbial clocks cleaned.

On the other hand, Jim Calhoun has been somewhat curious in the implementation of his offense. Calhoun has allowed the Huskies to depend on the athletic talents of the players. Sea plays seem to be few and far between and against a team that plays good man-to-man defense (hello Kansas), the Huskies could be in trouble.

Both teams have their share of strengths and weaknesses. The Huskies would exploit their advantage at the guard positions, while the Minutemen would own the boards. So where does this leave us?

This leaves us with UConn winning a close game because of their ability to shoot the ball with consistency (it means rarely changing) and success. UMass' perimeter defense would not be able to stand a sharp-shooting UConn backcourt.

See ya in Seattle.

country. Who fits the description? A future, NBA lottery pick from nearby Hartford in Canby.

Don't forget that Calhoun nearly cried when he lost Canby, an in-state product, to one of his favorite people, Calipari. Boo-hoo, Jim. Learn how to recruit and better luck next time.

The backcourts are mirror-images of one another. UConn's Doron Sheffer, Brian Fair and Kevin Ollie against UMass' Derek Kellogg, Mike Williams, Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso.

Sheffer's steady. Fair's explosive yet inconsistent, and Ollie is a great defender. Kellogg's steady, Williams explosive yet inconsistent, and Padilla is a great defender. Sounds familiar. The Minutemen, however, have intangibles that the Huskies sorely lack.

Williams has proven time and time again that he'll beat you if the game is on the line. Kellogg won't make mistakes and he can't be pressured. Padilla has no conscience and will do whatever Calipari tells him to, including run on the court without subbing in.

If Travieso wanted more playing time, he'd transfer to Storrs where he'd log at least 20+ minutes. Instead, he's content with his role in Amherst. Good choice.

Both teams are deep and can play good defense. This could be the difference tonight.

UMass' bench is solid. Inus Norville is as good as Knight, and he starts for the Huskies. Jeff Meyer is almost as skilled as Knight. Tyrone Weeks is too much of a force on the blocks for Rudy Johnson and Kirk King. Rigo Nunez has too much emotion for any Husky to contain.

So the Minutemen advance to the Final Four, while the Huskies head home.

For now, all we can do is predict. The fans can scream all they want. UConn fans can hold up signs that read, "We want UMass." A couple things ...

- Ask your coach why he doesn't want UMass.
- Stick to women's basketball.
- U-Scared, not U-Conn.

■ Minutewomen

However, that was as close as the Lady Knights would get, as the Minutewomen responded once again, running off 14 straight points (eight by Carroll) to squelch any hopes of a Rutgers comeback.

"When you get some easy baskets, like we did, your defense tends to step it up," O'Brien said.

Rutgers leading scorer, Sheeler, shot only 2-20 from the floor, finishing with a dismal four points. Senior Janell Williams led the Lady Knights with 15 points.

For Carroll, it was her second big game in a row. The sophomore was coming off a career-high 28 point outburst against West Virginia.

"I was kind of scared coming in because I didn't know what people were going to expect of me," said Carroll, who collected her first double-double of the year.

place in the conference and deserve national recognition. GW has been ranked in the Top 25 all year.

When the two teams met in Washington D.C. on Jan. 15, UMass lost by only nine points (69-60), but turned the ball over 30 times.

"Against George Washington, if [UMass'] inside game is on, they've got a shot. They have some nice players and most importantly, they have confidence going for them," Grentz said. "They've paid their dues and if they continue to get good players, they'll do alright."

"Saturday's game is a big one in the league for us. This is our opportunity to make some noise," O'Brien said. "In order to get consideration for the NCAAs we have to beat a Top 25 team, and Saturday we will have a chance."

Another important factor in the process is the players. If the Minutewomen can get another quality recruiting class added to the return of Kim Gregory along with Yanira Liceaga, the transfer from Puerto Rico who had to sit out the year, they should obtain their goal of reaching the big time.

Perhaps the final step in becoming a big time program, like a Connecticut or a Tennessee, is fan support. While the Lady Huskies and Lady Volunteers sell out their stadiums for every game, the Minutewomen have a hard time getting over 1,000. Only 762 fans were present for last night's game and a lot of them were in favor of Rutgers. A team that is 13-6 overall, 8-1 in the A-10, and winners of its last seven, has not yet been noticed by the student body at UMass.

"As we get better, we'll get the fans support," O'Brien said. "We have to show the University that we have a product."

But how good of a product does O'Brien have so far?

"I think we have to win the rest of our games and the A- 10's if we want to make it to the NCAAs," O'Brien said. "We're not going to worry about the NCAAs. We're going to worry about the A-10 tournament first.

"We're taking each game as it comes. When we get to the A-10 tournament, hopefully we can make some noise and get the gold trophy. We want the gold trophy."

Minutemen drop to No. 4 in poll

■ Loss of Camby a key for the remaining Atlantic 10 contests

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The No. 1 ranking is out of its hands, and the nation's longest winning of 16 came to an abrupt end in Feb. 4's 78– 75 loss to George Washington. However, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team still has the rest of the Atlantic 10 schedule in its grasp, and the regular season is far from over.

See game box on page 6

Piscataway, N.J., is the next stop on the wild conference ride for the Minutemen as they take on Rutgers (9-10, 4-5 in A-10) tonight at the Louis Brown Athletic Center. The Minutemen (17–2, 9–1) dropped from first to No. 4 after the GW loss.

George Washington gave the Minutemen their first loss in A-10 play, and did something that no other conference team has been able to do — finish them off.

There have been close calls as of late. On Jan. 10, St. Bonaventure took Massachusetts to double-overtime before bowing 81-76 in Olean, N.Y. A block and a pass deflection hampered Temple's attempt at an upset on Jan. 21, as Massachusetts edged the Owls, 59–58, at the William D. Mullins Center.

In Morgantown on Jan. 27, West Virginia owned an 18– point lead with 4:47 left in the contest, only to see Massachusetts tie it up in regulation, and win it on a Mike Williams 3-pointer with 16.5 seconds left in OT, 97–94.

Against the Colonials, the Minutemen owned the lead just twice. They did put a scare into GW at the end, compliments of an Edgar Padilla three-pointer with 10.6 seconds left that pulled Massachusetts to within one, 76–75.

But the classic finisher was put to rest, as Williams went to the bench with his fifth foul. And Vaughn Jones iced two free throws with 4.6 seconds to play, giving the Colonials the upset win.

"We didn't expect to win every game, I told you that. We're not running the table, this league is a tough league," Calipari said. "I said it before the game, and I'll say it again — if anyone wants to change schedules with us, I'll change. We'll play your schedule, you play ours. I won't even make you play the beginning of our schedule."

The last contest between the Minutemen and the Scarlet Knights was on Jan. 12. In that contest, Marcus Camby was ejected early on the second half after receiving his second technical foul of the game. Rutgers won't have to worry about Camby for both halves tonight, as Camby is out with a strained hamstring.

Camby is difficult to replace in the lineup, considering his all-around skills while being 6-foot-11. Playing well in his absence was Jeff Meyer, who stepped in for Camby after the injury against St. Joseph's, and Tyrone Weeks.

Meyer answered the call against St. Joseph's on Feb. 1 by scoring six points, grabbing five boards, blocking three shots, and garnering two steals in 15 minutes of action in the 74–62 victory.

While Meyer was nonexistent against GW last weekend, Weeks, who missed the four previous games due to symptoms of the flu, scored six points and pulled down seven rebounds in his 15 minutes of action. Although not Camby-numbers, the reserves have performed their role to the liking of Calipari.

"No, but I'll tell you what, he was fearless," Calipari said when asked if he expected to play Weeks as much as he did. "He played terrific basketball. I was really proud of him."

Lou Roe has also stepped it up since Camby went down. One of the 13 finalists for the RCA College Basketball Player of the Year along with Camby, Roc scored 19 points (including 9-10 from the field) against St. Joe's, and had 21 points and pulled down 12 rebounds at GW.

Roe, who's being doubled (and sometimes tripled) down on the post, is familiar with the defenses that are created to contain him as well as playing without the star center.

"There's no difference, it's like when [Camby] is out of the game when we're playing. Even if he is there, [teams] double-team me, so I'm used to it," Roe said. "Last year, we played without him over a stretch of games. We'll just have to hold the fort down until he gets back."

"We ran our same basic offense, we just had different guys in different spots," Kellogg said. "It was apparent a few times out there without him that some of the plays were a little altered with him being out of the game."

Minutewomen win big

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The icy wind and plummeting temperatures made for a frosty evening outside the William D. Mullins Center last night. Inside, the Rutgers Lady Knights were not much warmer.

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team turned up the heat on defense to hold their Atlantic 10 foes to a frigid 26.9 percent from the floor, as the Minutewomen coasted to the 74–57 victory.

The 57 points scored by Rutgers was the least they've put up all season, despite the fact that the Lady Knights have had five games against nationally-ranked opponents.

"This is a big win for us," said Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien. "We are still in a position to control our own destiny."

Massachusetts, who upped their record to 13–6, and 8–1 in conference play, used a 10–2 run at the end of the first half to pull ahead, and then posted 14 unanswered points late in the second half to blow the game open.

"We were able to wear them down," said UMass sophomore Crystal Carroll, who poured in 18 points to lead all scorers and also collected a game and career-high 14 rebounds.

"Give UMass credit," said Rutgers coach Theresa Grentz. "They played well. They've payed their dues, now they're confident and they're having a great year. They deserve it."

In the beginning, it looked like this matchup would be a battle throughout. Rutgers led much of the first half, and the Minutewomen were fighting an uphill battle.

O'Brien picked up a technical foul five minutes into the contest for protesting a foul called on freshman Kara Tudman, and then watched her junior leader Octavia Thomas pick up her third foul and a technical with five minutes remaining in the half.

With Thomas on the bench, and the Lady Knights up by two, 27–25, things looked bleak for the Minutewomen.

"It would have been easy for us to quit," said O'Brien.

"That fourth foul on Thomas should have been an opportunity for us to get going," Grentz said. "For some reason, we just didn't."

UMass did get going, however, closing the first half with a 12 run keyed by Carroll and junior Melissa Gurile (16 points on the night), that put them up 35–29 at the half.

"Tez (Kraft), a freshman, came in, made a big play, and suddenly we were playing on emotion," said Carroll.

"I don't know what happened," said Grentz, whose team fell to 9–12, 5–5 in the A-10. "We just go into these funks."

Rutgers and UMass opened the second half exchanging baskets. With 12 minutes remaining in the game, and the score 44–37 Minutewomen, UMass point guard Sabriya Mitchell went coast–to–coast for an acrobatic layup, and was fouled by Rutgers freshman Alicia Sheeler.

"I was just in a flow," said Mitchell. "Confidence was a big part of it."

Mitchell missed the ensuing free throw, but Carroll rebounded and drew another foul, keeping UMass alive in what would turn out to be a 7–0 run.

"I felt our depth was a factor," said O'Brien. "I felt we could run a little bit, and we should take advantage of it."

Despite UMass playing well, the Lady Knights were still in the game. When junior Liz Hanson made two free throws, Rutgers had the lead cut to 10 with six and a half minutes to play.

Women's hoop takes big step forward

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

They're almost there.

With their convincing 74–57 win over Rutgers University last night, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team stepped closer to its goal.

Its goal of being a big time program.

"UMass has done great things. I give them credit," Rutgers coach Theresa Grentz said. "I think [Massachusetts coach] Joanie [O'Brien] has done a great job with the program. They've continued to improve. And I think the success that John Calipari and his team has had has helped them too."

"In order to move up, you have to have a product that you can sell. We have a product," O'Brien said. "Are we there yet? No. Are we close? Yes."

They certainly are close and beating Rutgers was definitely an important step in the process.

The Minutewomen had never beaten the Lady Knights in 23 tries before beating them twice so far this season. Since the Atlantic 10 tournament championships began in 1983, Rutgers has come away with the trophy four times, including the last two years, and has been the runner-up three times. In the last 12 seasons, the Lady Knights have been ranked in the nation's Top 25 eight times, with the highest ranking being No. 5 in the 1986–87 season.

"This win was sweet because it keeps us in control of our own destiny. It was a big step," O'Brien said.

It was a win that keeps the Minutewomen in the hunt for the Atlantic 10 regular season title. The next step they have to take is beating George Washington. If the Minutewomen can come away with a victory against the No. 16 nationally- ranked Colonial Women, they would gain sole possession of first

The debate over bragging rights in New England

■ Sharpshooting backcourt key for UConn

Editors Note: Jamie Asbedian is the men's basketball beat writer for the Daily Campus (UConn's student newspaper).

STORRS, Conn. — Since I am writing this article for a UMass audience, as well as a UConn one, I will refrain from using any big words, or words that have more than two to three syllables.

I figure that if the UMass student body has the same academic record as their basketball team, they wouldn't understand a normal article written for UConn students.

Jamie Asbedian

I have indeed been looking forward to writing this article. I have lived in Massachusetts all my life, and have watched the rise of the UMass basketball team closely over the past couple of years. This year's team is indeed a fine specimen to behold.

Lou Roe is, in my estimation, one of the top 10 players in America. He has shown an ability to play with his back to the basket.

But not fine enough, in my humble opinion, to beat the UConn Huskies.

As we look at each team's 16–1 record, there is not a whole lot to talk about. UMass has defeated such impressive teams as Maryland and Arkansas, while UConn has defeated such other noted programs as Syracuse and Georgetown.

Yes, Maryland and Arkansas are impressive victories. Very impressive. But to suggest that UMass has a substantially harder schedule than UConn is absurd. It's the Atlantic 10, folks. Hello? Just because UMass squeaked out victories against pathetic opponents such as West Virginia, Temple and St. Bonaventure does not categorize these teams as good.

What it does say is that UMass is a streaky team and capable of turning out a lousy performance on any given night. The only difference is that UConn could not win a Big East game on a bad night, as UMass has done against their A-10 opponents.

Despite the similar records, UConn and UMass both play to each others weaknesses. UMass has a vastly superior frontcourt to UConn's. Despite my abhorrence (that means I don't like it) of UMass basketball, their frontline is a specimen to behold.

Lou Roe is, in my estimation, one of the top 10 players in America. He has shown an ability to play with his back to the basket on several occasions, and has good range for a guy his size. He also attacks the glass, which has been where UConn has had its trouble.

The combination of Marcus Camby and Roe would present UConn with the same problems as Kansas' Raef LaFrentz and Greg Ostertag did. Problems the Huskies did not handle well.

I will, however, say that Roe gets the star treatment more than anyone in the world.

Although UMass has a decided advantage under the glass, the Huskies enjoy a somewhat equal advantage in the backcourt. Kevin Ollie, Doron Sheffer and Ray Allen are substantially more effective than Mike Williams, Derek Kellogg and Dana Dingle. There is no one on the Minutemen who could guard Ray Allen. Nobody.

UMass doesn't really play defense, so why would they be even remotely successful against a guy who lit up Syracuse for 31 points? Ollie and Sheffer should and would apply pressure which UMass hasn't seen all season.

Arkansas, UMass' only opponent which has traditionally been effective in applying full court pressure, was completely off their game in the season–opener against UMass.

As far as sixth men are concerned, I would take Brian Fair over Edgar Padilla every day of the week and twice on Sunday. The rest of the bench is equally suspect for both teams.

Now I am not talking about guys who regularly come off the bench and play. I am talking about guys who come off the bench and play well. UConn has Rudy Johnson and Kirk King who make solid contributions on occasion.

Turn to UCONN, page 6

■ Calhoun and Co. 'scared' to play UMass

Welcome to the Brendan Byrne Arena, East Rutherford, N.J. and the site of today's NCAA Eastern Regional Final between the No. 2 seed University of Connecticut and the No. 1 seed University of Massachusetts.

It could happen. The Minutemen and the Huskies in the Great Eight. The fans could rant and rave all they want in the regular season and relish the thought that they are the best team in America, yet one game in the Big Dance will have determine it all.

Art Stapleton Jr.

Why? Because Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun won't sign on the dotted line — plain and simple. UMass has adopted the slogan, "Refuse to Lose — Any Team, Any Time, Any Place," while the Huskies should think about "Refuse to Play."

Has UConn been able to go on the road and pick up a good win? No. They got blown out at Kemper Arena by Kansas.

All things considered, it would be a great game if and when it is played. Massachusetts coach John Calipari says he'll play it in the middle of Interstate–91, Connecticut Athletic Director Lew Perkins has been quoted as saying that his team plays too many New England squads already.

Let's see — Yale, Hartford ... that out–of–conference schedule is oh–so tough. Talk about beating up on intrastate [hold the laughter] rivals. Besides the Big East, what quality wins does UConn have?

Duke is on the verge of receiving a bid to the tournament — the NIT. Yet Huskies' fans still point to that win as a big one. Neutral court, a subpar Blue Devil team, and the Huskies barely squeak by.

Has UConn been able to go on the road and pick up a good win? No. They got blown out at Kemper Arena by Kansas. Who else has UConn played? Exactly. No one.

UMass, on the other hand, has one of the most impressive wins this season in all of college basketball — beating Maryland, the best player in America in Joe Smith, and 13,332 screaming fans in Baltimore. Throw in a home win over defending national champion Arkansas, victories over Pennsylvania, Western Kentucky and St. Louis, all definite NCAA tourney teams, and you have the Minutemen.

So who would win if the two met on the court? Since the only battles thus far have been played on paper, let's dream a little bit further ...

What a battle on the baseline between UConn's superstar Ray Allen and UMass' small forward tandem of Donta Bright and Dana Dingle.

Allen is a stud, an NBAer — there's no question about it. He can score, play defense and shoot. Yet sometimes two can be better than one, and many times when Bright and Dingle need to step up, they do. Bright has one of the sweetest jumpers inside of 15–feet, and Dingle has never seen a rebound he can't get.

Ask North Carolina's Jerry Stackhouse, who has blossomed into the most explosive forward in the nation, if Dingle and Bright can play defense.

One of the best in the nation, Minutemen Lou Roe, will have his hands full with UConn's Donny Marshall.

No, he won't. Roe is as good on the blocks as there is, and there isn't a player you'd rather have in a big game. He's a ferocious rebounder and has improved his defensive game tremendously. Give Marshall credit. He has heart and is developing an offensive attack with his strength inside, yet is no match for Roe.

Ask Arkansas' Corliss Williamson, pound–for–pound the strongest, most intense player in the game, just how tough Roe can be.

Both the Minutemen and the Huskies have size in the middle — UMass' Marcus Camby and UConn's Travis Knight.

Knight's a good player. He's big, he's big and he's big. That's it. Nothing else. He can't shoot. He can't run the floor like a guard. He's not the best defensive player in the Rally protests teenager's slaying

■ Hundreds gather in show of support on anniversary of shooting

By Chris Conner and Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Despite freezing temperatures, an assembly of supporters from Massachusetts and beyond braved the cold to protest the murder of a Springfield teenager by a police officer exactly one year ago.

Approximately 200 people, many representing the February 7th Coalition, marched outside of the Springfield Police Headquarters for over an hour, chanting such slogans as, "No Justice, No Peace," "More Money for Jobs/No Money for Cops" and "The People United Will Never be Defeated."

The February 7th Coalition is an organization started by friends and family of Benjamin Schoolfield, who are seeking justice for what they consider a blatant display of police brutality, according to Chelan Jenkins, an organizer of the Coalition.

While driving a van that was mistakenly reported stolen, the 21–year–old Schoolfield, a Black Springfield native, was fatally shot by White Officer Donald Brown. According to witnesses, Schoolfield, who was operating the vehicle at slow speed, was unarmed.

The alleged mishandling of the incident, the lack of discipline granted to Brown and rumors concerning racism and harassment around the case raised the ire of the Schoolfield family, and led to the formation of the coalition, Jenkins said.

Schoolfield's mother speaks out

Ella Schoolfield, the mother of the deceased, who has recently endured a stroke and two open heart surgeries, chose to remain in a car during the protest. This was the first protest she has been able to attend.

"The rally goes to show that Blacks, Whites, Puerto Ricans...all people can come together," Schoolfield said.

"I have been sick, and I don't go out much. I feel brave, and I hope the rally has a wonderful effect on the people of Springfield. The way Ben was shot was not right."

Many present at the rally expressed their discontent with the case they consider to be a miscarriage of justice.

"I am sorry the eyewitnesses were not able to testify," Amherst resident John Langford said, referring to the five Black eyewitnesses. "The trial should be re-opened."

"We are demanding a community review board with real oversight powers so police misconduct can be thoroughly investigated," said Nick Camerota, a Schoolfield family friend.

Coalition demands trial

In addition to the community review board, the coalition is also demanding that Brown be tried for murder, that all information regarding the investigation be released, and that the officers who organized the party in praise of Brown's actions be dismissed from the police force.

Kevin Murphy, a leader of the International Socialist Organization (ISO), was among the first to offer help in the form of political action to the emotionally-distraught Schoolfields.

Soon thereafter, ISO chapters in the New England area and across the northeast, stretching as far west as Chicago, became involved in the crusade, Jenkins said.

Support has expanded beyond family, friends and ISO members to other organizations and private citizenry.

Jay Armstrong, a member of the ISO at the University of Massachusetts, was involved in planning Tuesday's rally, and said he was pleasantly surprised by the turnout at the police station.

"I think it shows that people are still really concerned about the case," Armstrong said. "I think we took [the police] off–guard with our numbers."

Yesterday's rally was the largest Schoolfield–related event, as of yet, according to Armstrong.

The police were not able to be reached for comment.

Much of the turnout was probably because of the relentless speaking schedule of the murdered teen's siblings, Jamie Schoolfield–Lyles and Henry Schoolfield.

Schoolfield–Lyles spoke at a forum at UMass last November, and the pair has recently traveled to both Smith and Hampshire Colleges, said Chelan Jenkins, an organizer of the February 7th Coalition.

In addition to stops in Worcester and Providence, Schoolfield–Lyles has even ventured to Chicago to speak on her brother's behalf.

Rally seen as 'positive'

"I think [the rally] was very positive," Schoolfield–Lyles said.

"I'm glad the issue goes beyond my family. This shows the police that they can't get away with it. If we have to come out here every day and do this, we will."

Other representatives from UMass, primarily from the Alliance for Student Power (ASP), seemed just as resilient in their defiance of police brutality.

"We hate racist cops just as much as anyone else," ASP President Ken Miller said.

"I don't know what more we could do as a group here," ASP member Chris Masterman said.

"I guess the next thing to do is to break down the door and drag them out."

No violence occurred at the demonstration, and police monitored the rally from inside their automobiles. However, according to Jenkins, police brutality did occur at a previous march.

The coalition has set a March 1 deadline for Springfield officials to meet their demands.

"We haven't planned anything yet, but we'll see what happens with this," Armstrong said. "No response is a response from [the officials]."

House votes to require criminals to pay victims

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Moving systematically through the "Contract With America," the House unanimously agreed to legislation today requiring that criminals pay restitution to their victims.

The 431-0 vote came on the first of a series of bills designed to overhaul last year's crime bill under terms dictated by majority Republicans. Other measures, likely to prove more controversial, would curb death row appeals and redirect some of the money in the 1994 measure dedicated to crime prevention programs.

Rep. George Gekas (R-Pa.), said the measure approved was designed to provide the "ultimate sense of satisfaction and restitution" to victims.

The first in the series of crime bills came the day after the House overwhelmingly approved legislation to strengthen a president's hand in weeding out wasteful federal spending.

"It's an important step on a bipartisan basis to do it for the president of the United States, without regard to party or ideology," House Speaker Newt Gingrich said Monday night shortly before passage of the measure, which would permit rejection of individual spending items within larger bills. The vote was 294-134, with more than one-third of House Democrats — 71 — joining 223 Republicans in favor.

Now, a president must sign or veto an entire bill that often provides billiuns of dollars for hundreds of individual programs. The vote allows GOP leaders to check another item off the 100-day "Contract With America" agenda that led to the Republican sweep in last fall's elections.

At the same time, it sets the stage for a strong battle over the measure this spring in the Senate, where opponents claim it would cede too much power to a president. "There are people over there who desperately want to protect pork," Gingrich (R-Ga.), said moments after the House vote.

Next up in the House: a series of bills to make changes in last year's bitterly fought crime law. The aim would be to give punishment and deterrence greater emphasis over the crime-prevention programs contained in last year's bill. One of two measures on today's schedule would require anyone convicted of a federal crime to pay full restitution to the victim. Another would give prosecutors greater leeway in using evidence seized in violation of constitutional protections, so long as police were acting in good faith.

"There's no way we're going to solve the crime problem, but we can make it a lot tougher on criminals and set the stage for assisting the states in creating more prisons and having tougher sentences and short-circuiting endless appeals," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill).

Gingrich and the Republicans have put off until spring a bill that Clinton has vowed to veto: a repeal of last year's ban on certain types of assault-style weapons.

Clinton is a strong advocate of the line-item veto, however, and is expected to sign the measure if it reaches his desk.

Rep. Martin Sabo (D-Minn.), echoing concerns expressed by others, said the line-item veto bill "transfers incredible power to the president to modify spending decisions of the Congress," including not only highway projects often cited by critics of "pork barrel spending" but also education and other programs.

But Republicans and many Democrats said Congress had failed to control spending, and it was time to strengthen the hand of the president — any president.

Northampton may end smoking ban; Amherst concerned

By Marnie Thamel and Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Concern has risen in Amherst due to a recent meeting in Northhampton concerning the possibility of rescinding their smoking ban.

According to the Springfield Union–News, late in January a "secret meeting" with town officials and restaurant owners took place in Northhampton. The possibility of coming to a compromise on the smoking ban was discussed.

The smoking ban, which went into effect in November, makes smoking illegal in public places, including restaurants. Bars will be banned as of July 1.

The Union–News reported a proposal came from the meeting asking to end the smoking ban, but slowly over a number of years.

Larry Kelley, a town meeting member and business owner in Amherst, said such a compromise would hurt Amherst restaurants who are also effected by an identical smoking ban.

"It's absurd," said Kelley. "They shouldn't be having secret meetings."

In a letter Kelley wrote to Elizabeth Scheibel, a District Attorney in Hampshire and Franklin County, he said if a proposal had been reached at such a meeting, then the public's right to know has been compromised.

City Counellor Patrick Goggins, who called the meeting in Northampton, said no government business took place, but they talked about a possible compromise to the smoking policy.

"Technically [the meeting] may have been legal," said Kelley. "But it's a violation of the spirit of the law."

Some Amherst restaurants will also be seeking a compromise to the smoking ban.

Gerry Jolly, manager of Seasons Restaurant, The Pub and Rafters, said he will be trying to get Amherst to ease off on the smoking ban sometime in the future.

"I think if Northampton goes to a program where they phase in the smoking ban [instead of immediate elimination]," said Jolly, "then I hope the Board of Health in Amherst will look at that and possibly reconsider to doing the same."

Jolly said he has not seen any effect the ban has had on his restaurant business, but it has damaged the bar business.

Although bars are excluded from the ban until July 1, The Pub, which becomes a bar in the evening, was still considered a restaurant and was regulated under the smoking ban.

"The Pub lost 25 percent of its business because of the smoking ban," Jolly said.

In an effort to regain his customers, Jolly obtained a variance from the Department of Health in which he was allowed to permit smoking at the popular student hang–out between the hours of 10 p.m. and 1 a.m.

"I had to put in $5,000 worth of filtration equipment and have the air tested," said Jolly. "We had to make sure the people the next day having lunch wouldn't be effected by any nicotine in the air."

According to Jolly, The Pub is kind of a test sight because of the filtration system. He said he plans to use the data gathered from the tests and go before the Department of Health to attempt to reach a compromise before the July 1 deadline.

Betty Frederick, director of the Amherst Health Department said she was not aware of any proposals as of yet to rescind the ban.

Center looking for help to fight high tuition

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) is looking for students who want to fight increases in tuition and lobby for the UMass state budget while earning credit or $6 per hour under the Access to Quality campaign.

The $7.5 million increase in the budget at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst last year was just a practice run, according to Marc Kenen, director of the SCERA.

"This year we hope to be bigger and better," Kenen said.

The students are paid in part with funds donated by faculty and staff members, totaling about $10,000, according to Kenen. The Student Government Association (SGA), and other campus organizations also fund the campaign.

Available positions include phone callers, campus organizers, student lobbyists and State and Community college liaisons.

State and Community college liaisons have begun working on the campaign, according to Mirran Raphaely, president of the Student Government Association. The group, which consists of student representatives from Massachusetts' community colleges, and state colleges and universities, prepared an agenda on Jan. 28 which will be presented by student government representatives to state legislators at the statehouse in Boston on Monday, Feb 13, said Raphaely.

The agenda begins with a motion passed for each institution to "fight for the budget requests of their individual institutions for the fiscal year 1996 in the context of the overall increase of 6.9 percent for public higher education."

"SCERA's goal is to involve students in student government in an effort to lower tuition fees and improve the quality of their education by obtaining more money for the university from state legislature," Kenen said.

"The student response to the jobs has been great so far," Kenen said.

This year, the number of phone callers will increase from 20 to 30, and 25 additional lobbyists will be added to last year's 15. Over 40 students have applied for the pay or credit positions, said the director.

Last year the phone callers reached 3,500 parents of students of whom 95 percent agreed to call or write to their state legislator in support of the budget, according to Kenen.

"This year we hope to double that and hit 7,000," the director said.

"Contacting parents was exciting, because parents understood that it is a principal fight, and most agreed to call legislators," Raphaely said.

"Many state legislators reported receiving more calls and letters about UMass than any other state budget issue," said Kenen.

Representatives said they could not take the influx of phone calls, according to Raphaely.

President Michael K. Hooker has acknowledged that the 3,500 phone calls last year to parents of UMass students played a major if not primary role in the standstill of tuition and fees, Raphaely said.

"The freeze in tuition and fees was the first in 20 years," Kenen said.

For more information or to apply for an Access to Quality position, contact the SGA office at 545-0341. The deadline is 3 p.m. on Friday.

Profs entertain at department poetry reading

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

REBECCA PETERSON / COLLEGIAN

Dara Wier read selections from her new prose collection at Herter Hall yesterday afternoon.

University of Massachusetts faculty and students were crowded in couches, sitting on window sills and standing in the doorway to hear the UMass English department's latest poetry reading.

Professors Dara Wier and Paul Mariani read from both published and unpublished works yesterday at the latest of the English department's "Tuesday at Four" poetry readings. The reading was chaired by Pulitzer Prize winning poet and UMass professor James Tate.

Wier read such works as "The Cubist Rotissare," "I Remember Rilke," "The Secret Life," "Cerification Cereal" and "Fly on the Wall."

In introducing Mariani, Tate gave praise to the passion and vibrancy in Mariani's work.

"I ask myself 'How did he live before he began writing poetry.'" said Tate.

According to Tate, poets have an inner need to express themselves through poetry, and Mariani's poetry is an example of this need.

"Poets learn from their poem or else why bother," Tate said.

Mariani began with a requested poem. The poem, "A&P Night Shift," was inspired by Castro's actions in taking over Cuba.

Mariani also read the selections "Good Night Irene," "Then," "The Republic" and "Quid Pro Quo." Some selections, such as "Show and Tell," received rounds of laughter from the audience.

"This is a very interesting combination," said Garrett Doherty, an English graduate student, "to have two diverse writers read their poems together today."

"More people should come out and hear poetry," said Robyn Heisey-Clark, an English graduate student. "Poetry is not a happening thing."

Wier has been with the University for over nine years. She is the author of five books including The Book of Knowledge, All You Have in Common and The 8-Step Grapevine.

Wier received her bachelor's degree at Longwood College in 1971 and received her master's from Bowling Green University in 1974. Wier

Pennies to be saved for area trail upkeep

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

A unique fund-raising method will be used to repair the approximate 90 miles of trails in the Amherst area over the next three summers.

The campaign, Pennies for Trails, is sponsored by the Kestrel Trust and the Amherst Conservation Commission and will focus on financing the maintenance of the trails found in Amherst and eight surrounding towns, according to Peter Westover, Amherst Conservation Commission Director.

"The Kestrel Trust is a body that brings together the conservation interests of the nine adjacent towns," said Ellen Knox, chair of Pennies for Trails. The nine towns to be included are Amherst, Belchertown, Granby, Hadley, Leverett, Pelham, South Hadley, Shutesbury and Sunderland.

"We'll have a three-person crew to do the work each summer, as far as time allows," Westover said.

The work includes an initial inspection, followed by a removal of overhanging limbs and vegetation "that pinches in from the sides or top," Westover said.

Coins will be collected on April 6, 7, 8 and 9 at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Building, the Fleet Bank in Amherst center and the Super Stop & Shop in Hadley. There is also talk of J.C. Penny at the Hampshire Mall in Hadley partaking in the collection, according to Knox.

The Pennies for Trails drive started in November of 1994 when an anonymous donor saw news about eroding trails, Knox said. This donor contributed $1,000 worth of pennies, and has also agreed to match up to $5,000.

The target is to raise $15,000 in the next three years, Knox said.

"Originally we wanted pennies," Knox said. "Now we'll accept nickels, dimes and quarters."

So far, Knox has heard rumors about several interesting prospective donations.

"Someone has a barn full of pennies," Knox said. "Someone else has two socks full of pennies for us. Money that's sitting around and not doing anything, let's put it to work."

The biggest and most widely used trail in the area is the 35-mile Robert Frost Trail. It stretches from Mount Toby in the north to Shutesbury and Pelham in the east. Mount Toby is in Sunderland, Westover said.

The Metacomet-Monadnock and K.C. Trails will also benefit from the drive.

The Metacomet-Monadnock Trail is currently in need of repair and maintenance. It stretches approximately 118 miles, according to Westover.

"It was built way back in the '50s," Westover said. "Part of it goes through this area."

The K.C. Trail, located in South Amherst, was named in memoriam after the late Ken Cuddeback, former chairman of the Amherst Conservation Commission.

"I like that the drive will make us think of the trails as a treasure we'll maintain," Knox said.

Dole: Congress not the answer to baseball strike

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Just hours before President Clinton was to receive his mediator's solution to the baseball strike, Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole urged players and owners to accept it.

"Today's the day," the Kansas Republican said this morning on the Senate floor. "There is simply no more sand left in the negotiating hourglass."

With the strike in its 179th day, mediator W.J. Usery was to deliver the plan to Clinton at 3 p.m. EST in the White House. Usery was to hand it over on Monday, but asked Clinton for more time and was granted the delay.

Dole and House Speaker Newt Gingrich said they didn't think the solution to the strike would be found in Congress.

"Let me be crystal clear," he said, "neither party - player nor owner — should be looking to Congress for any magic solutions....If for some reason the players and owners can't reach an agreement today, then they should so the next best thing, which is to voluntarily accept whatever settlement special mediator Bill Usery may propose. If it's good enough for Bill Usery, I'm confident it's good enough for baseball."

White House spokesman Mike McCurry, without divulging details, said sending legislation to Congress was an option.

"Why would anyone who loves baseball want to take a tool off the table that might be useful in helping convince the players and owners to try harder to settle their strike? That doesn't make a lot of sense," he said.

White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta hinted at the president's next step.

"There's obviously, at some point, a time if we don't get agreement when the president is going to have to recommend further action to the Congress," he said during an interview on Fox television.

The president could propose special legislation to enact terms of a settlement or binding arbitration, but both types of bills would have to be approved by the House and Senate.

Gingrich wasn't keen on the idea.

"I'm not sure Congress is the right place to try to organize the national pastime," he said today. "So I'd be very, very cautious. This is a straight out labor-management struggle. It's not a matter of national survival. I'm not sure what the national interest is in having the Congress start to micro-manage baseball."

The sides haven't met at the bargaining table since Saturday. On Monday, players filed another unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board.

"It's just a few hundred folks trying to figure out how to divide nearly $2 billion," Clinton said Monday, summing up a popular sentiment. "They ought to be able to figure that out." But with so much money at stake, and the sides so far apart, it didn't seem that easy.

"On this 100th anniversary of Babe Ruth's birth, the Babe would not be enormously optimistic for any quick settlement right now," Labor Secretary Robert Reich said Monday.

Usery tried his best to be upbeat, despite bouncing back and forth from the White House to the Mayflower Hotel, where talks were definitely not taking place.

"I refuse to be pessimistic, although it is very difficult to seem to find a voluntary agreement between the parties," he said.

In college, it's perhaps the toughest exam you'll ever have to take. There is no formal preparation — no lectures or office hours; no grades or credits. It's usually given some sleepless night, lying in bed under your glow-in-the-dark stars; or in the early hours of the morning as you look yourself in the mirror and catch your eyes looking back; or even while staring out of your windshield waiting for the light to turn green. It creeps and crawls until one day, with a jolt comparable to a lightning bolt, it grabs you: "Who am I?"

Everyone at a collegiate age goes through this natural process of "Who am I?" and "Where do I belong?" Our parents and grandparents and great–grandparents and those before them, have been confronted with this age–old confrontation of the self. And although, to the one left puzzling over it, this isn't of great comfort, it's a personal thing, and we all have our own woes of getting through it. But everyone does go through it. Which is exactly why I find it so irritating — and ridiculous — that the generations before us find our identity crisis' such newsworthy material.

If I read, hear or look at one more headline about "Generation X" and what we are all about, I will scream. I cannot fathom why our generation has become such a phenomenon to this country. It is maddening to me that these people, whoever they are, have decided to solve our identity crisis themselves, by flat out telling us who we are, where we belong, and what we are all about.

Current trends and attitudes have always been of public interest. But we, as "Generation X" are not at the root of all of them. Generations A, B and C either have too much time on their hands or not enough courage to face the problems of their own. Why they seemingly have this need to portray us as little heartless, ignorant beasts running around rocking havoc and causing all society's evils — is bewildering.

First, not all of us wear flannel or listen to bands from Seattle. Second, we are not all a bunch of misguided slackers who are strung–out on heroin, or burnt out by marijuana or binge drinking every night of the week. Third, not all of us bring guns to school or rape and pillage our campuses. Fourth, not all of us have tattoos and piercing in places most would think unimaginable. And finally, Kurt Cobain was not the voice of our generation. He was a talented contributor to the music world; he was never known for his eloquence. Simply put, your brandings do not suit us.

And as for those of us who do wear flannel, have a tattoo, smoke pot or have a candle lit shrine to Cobain in our bedroom, we can still be intelligent, passionate and motivated people. Some of us are staring at life in the eyes without much hope of ever really getting to know it because things are seemingly falling apart around us. It's hard to have hope within the incessant criticism, insults and judgements thrown in our faces at every turn of the channel, page or dial.

Every generation has its own problems to face and every generation has its new ideas — why ours is causing such a stir and onslaught of negative publicity is perplexing. Every generation tends to feel somewhat misunderstood, but come now, we are not that bad — give us a little credit.

Yes, we are somewhat disconcented and confused and occasionally weird — just like the generation before us. But we are not a letter. We are a large mass of young individuals struggling as hard as we can to fit into a world changing and growing faster than we can blink and where the odds of survival are decreasing daily. We are an alphabet of individuals who would rather just be left alone than constantly analyzed like little mice. Pardon us if we seem cynical or strange, we have a lot on our minds.

Industry needs to be regulated

To justify hamstringing federal regulatory agencies, Republicans strive to make fashionable the idea that industry is stifled by rigid, fuss–budget federal bureaucrats, and that all Americans will benefit from the increased efficiency of less–regulated business and lower government costs.

Recent history proves that claim to be utter nonsense. Time and again, regulation has saved the country from ecological and human disasters (or de–regulation has caused the disasters), sometimes on a huge scale. Some examples:

• The European drug Thalidomide, a tranquilizer, in the '50s was about to be approved for use in the United States when Frances Kelsey, a dedicated staffer with the Food and Drug Administration blew the whistle. Thalidomide, she proved, caused severe birth defects in infants when pregnant women had taken it. Approval was denied in the nick of time.

• The Environmental Protection Agency in the '80s was moving, slowly to require removal of the anti–knock agent, tetraethyl lead from gasoline, primarily because the compound disabled catalysts which prevented severe pollution from automobiles. The oil and automobile industries protested mightily, and the EPA said, okay, we'll go slowly because not all cars will have the catalysts for a long time anyway.

Then the federal Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta produced a study proving that lead from auto exhausts was as much a source of high levels of lead in the blood of children — and thus of serious childhood lead poisoning with its severe consequences of diminished intelligence, and serious neurological problems — as peeling lead–based paint in houses.

Once again, industry was dragged kicking and screaming into the ecological age as EPA decided to move faster on lead removal. Naturally, none of the dire effects forecast by industry ever materialized, and now the country, and its children, get along just fine without leaded gasoline.

• President Ronald Reagan was instrumental in deregulating Savings and Loans. The disastrous outcome of that move is well–known to every American (or it should be).

• The fetal alcohol syndrome is well–known today. But it wasn't always; back in the early 1980s when researchers first began to call for warnings to pregnant women on booze bottles against excessive (or even moderate) drinking of alcohol, the liquor industry screamed like a banshee. Now, of course, the syndrome is well–understood, and the warnings appear on the bottles. Untold millions of women have decided to eschew alcohol during pregnancy.

• Industry portrayed as illicit regulatory meddling successful mid–'70s efforts to limit certain chemicals in spray cans when scientists claimed the chemicals harm the ozone layer that protects living beings from searing ultraviolet rays from the sun. But after a NASA report saying ozone was being depleted at exactly the altitude that was predicted by opponents of the chemicals, federal agencies moved more quickly to ban these chemicals and to limit other ones that harmed the ozone layer. Now there appears to be a good chance of restoration of the ozone layer.

The above is only the tiniest sampling of the ways in which regulation has prevented disaster — or de–regulation has caused it — over the years. To claim that industry would regulate itself if there were no government regulation is as patently absurd a statement as any ever uttered by a politician — which is really saying something — and yet Republicans do it all the time.

Let Upton Sinclair's description of a Chicago sausage factory before FDA regulation (in his book, The Jungle) stand as my conclusion. Read it and then weep for the American people if the Republicans should get their way.

"There would be meat stored in great piles in rooms; and the water from leaky roofs would drip over it, and thousands of rats would race about on it...These rats were nuisances, and the packers would put poisoned bread out for them, they would die, and then rats, bread and meat would go into the hoppers together."

Learning about real punk

Paul Sarkis

This column is directed to a certain number of the student population. The silent majority who seem to create pop– culture and exploit anything that lay in their path. The question, then, is whether or not this column is directed toward you.

Here is a very simple test to take to figure out whether or not I am addressing you. Let's say that I were to ask you to list any punk music you listen to. If, after scanning your music collection, the only bands you arrive at are the Offspring and Green Day, then pull up a seat son (or daughter), we've got something to talk about.

I had known for quite some time that things were looking pretty bad, however it was not until this past break that I realized the depth we had reached. It was a fateful weekday afternoon in which my nightmare was realized. I turned on the television, and flipped to MTV, that bastion of popular culture, only to find to my utter dismay that the program showing was a "punk" edition of "The Grind."

There, before my very eyes, I saw a most vile display of popular commercialism which filled me with the urge to vomit. There were people dressed in some Seattle meets hip– hop mall apparel, moving around like Janet Jackson on crack. Some were banging their heads towards the camera flinging their very nicely styled locks about, while others attempted to (for lack of a better word) "slam" by bouncing off of each other while screaming at the camera.

Needless to say the music for this "punk" party was a very user–friendly selection ranging from Rancid to Nirvana, to, you guessed it, Green Day. Now, I realize that MTV, being the devil, would take every opportunity it could to capitalize on current trends, however this blatant display of clueless adoration is indicative of a current musical trend.

Green Day is being hailed as the band that revived punk, the only problem there is that punk did not need any reviving, since this scene was doing just fine with its diligent and small following. Along comes Billie Joe and the boys, leaving Lookout, and signing a major label, eventually selling their souls to MTV. This guaranteed their success and sealed punk's fate.

That is not the worst of it though, believe it or not. The Epitaph label (Bad Religion, Offspring, Pennywise, Rancid, NOFX, etc.) has become a major label, with Mr. Brett, formerly of Bad Religion raking in $6 million off of the album Smash. Bad Religion themselves have made videos for two tracks off of their latest release Stranger Than Fiction. So when does it all end?

Right now...I would like to implore those of you out there who fit the description from above to cease and desist immediately. It is the smart thing to do for you, if you really wanted to exploit a band like Bad Religion, you're dealing with almost 10 more discs to buy which is obviously not an economically viable option.

There is a new wanna–be punk culture out there whose clothing is available at Jordan Marsh and whose originality rivals that of American car manufacturers. I mean who are you rebelling against? Your buddy who looks just like you, and acts just like you, and listens to the same music? What I am trying to say is you can have Green Day, you can keep Offspring, but from now on, stick to Boyz II Men, Candlebox and Madonna. They look better on a magazine cover.

Letters to the Editor

Antonio's driver saves the day

To the editor:

It's only the first weekend of spring semester 1995, and the issue of safe transportation to and from parties has already come up. We are always told, don't drive drunk, and don't get into the car with people who have been drinking, and if worse comes to worse, you can always just call a cab. Since it was so unbearably frigid outside, on the evening of Feb. 2, I suggested the noble idea of calling a taxi to deliver us to our favorite bar, "Time Out," instead of having to worry about how we would get there and back safely. Also, we wouldn't have to walk or wait for the bus.

We left our coats at home. Yes, we realize now that it was stupid, but what were we supposed to do with them at the bar? Hang them on our non–existent chairs? Anyway, when we arrived, we gave the cabbie an extra healthy tip so that he would be sure to come get us at 1:15 a.m. when the bars closed. He took down our reservation and called it in to the dispatcher. We settled on a meeting place and we were all set to break in the new semester.

We had a fantastic time, as usual, but the fun came to an end when the bars closed and our cab was nowhere to be seen. We headed to Antonio's in order to seek refuge from the cold. There, we waited and watched. I, myself, went down to the corner to call the cab to make sure it was on the way. Great! It was on route 116...only minutes away. I made my way back to Antonio's to notify the others.

Twenty–five minutes had passed since I had called, and the cab still did not show. We huddled in a shivering trio cursing and dreaming of our down comforters and wool socks. One of the Antonio's workers came out to dump the trash and was surprised that we were still there. I asked him to call for us once again. He did, and he relayed to us that it would be yet another 20 minutes!

By this time, our toes were frozen and our faces numb. Desperate times call for desperate measures, so we headed across the street to the Baybank ATM center where we continued our lookout. It was 2:15 a.m. at this point, and we were stranded.

Why didn't we just walk? Well, first of all, we were confident that the cab would come, and second, we had no coats. We were in fact offered random rides home from other drunk, dirt stay–outs, but we sensibly refused knowing we had a sober ride on its way. Fat chance! I was ready to shack up at Baybank when the Antonio's worker came over and offered our poor souls a ride home.

Well, there are many lessons to be learned here. First, always bring your jacket. Second, there are some good–hearted people in the world, and most importantly, you can't always just take a cab!

Graduate points out positives of UMass

To the editor:

A recent study of UMass makes it sounds as if UMass was an undesirable university to attend. I beg to differ. Even though we get the bad publicity, as in the Boston Globe, unethically releasing the academic marks of the basketball players, it turned out that they WERE scholastically qualified and conformed to NCAA standards. I was outraged that their privacy was violated. Not long ago, Memphis State had a basketball graduation rate of zero. On the percentage of minorities, I have figures that vary from yours.

A. There are 1,800 minority students at UMass–Amherst, not bad for a school that gets bad publicity.

B. The freshman class had 1,500 students that were minorities.

These figures exceed any university in the commonwealth!

We have other prominent Black leaders besides athletes.

A. Randolph Bromery, former chancellor.

B. Natalie Cole.

C. Unita Blackwell, the first Black woman to be a mayor in Mississippi.

There are other achievers: The women's field hockey team, rated no. 4 in the nation.

How many people know about our super UMass marching band? Have they heard of the music director, George Parks? Don't leave us George, please.

In spite of being underfunded, UMass has an excellent academic reputation.

I hope that this information will enlighten those who have adverse opinions of OUR STATE U!

Helmet's performance energizes audience

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

HELMET
Pearl Street
Feb. 6

This past Monday night at Pearl Street in Northampton, Helmet confirmed their reputation as one of the most talented and innovative metal acts around today. The New York City quartet ripped through a powerful 60–minute set that showcased their versatility with both rapid–fire aggression and slow, methodical dirges.

From the choppy, start–and–stop rhythms characteristic of their earlier material to the more groove–oriented structure of last year's Betty LP, the band's performance was exceptionally tight, reflecting their emphasis on collaboration and cohesion among the band members.

Credit is particularly owed to drummer John Stanier whose impeccable timing held things together flawlessly and kept the whole musical juggernaut rumbling along.

One of the show's highlights came early on in the form of "Sinatra," an ominous number in which the band raised the art of building musical tension to a new level. The sinister shuffle of their hit single "Unsung" elicited a violently explosive reaction from the capacity crowd.

The band's re–working of "Just Another Victim" (originally a collaboration with House Of Pain for the Judgement Night soundtrack) also had seemingly everyone caught up in the frenzy of moshing and stage–diving which persisted throughout the night.

Ironically, the high point of the evening came as the final song of the encore with a song which epitomized the best elements of Helmet's unique metal–core sound. "Turned Out" combined churning guitars, complex tempo changes and venomous vocals to end the show with a furious crescendo.

Although not able to utilize Helmet frontman Page Hamilton's PHD in music, opening act Sick Of It All was also impressive in their first performance since returning to the U.S. from an international tour.

It was clear from their set Monday night that their recent signing to a major label has not taken any of the edge off of this seminal NYC hardcore outfit. Although a long way from the now legendary CBGB's "Sunday Matinees" of the mid–eighties, Sick Of It All attempted to bring the same sense of fun and unity that they possessed a decade ago to the Pearl Street stage, and their efforts were largely successful.

"Are you looking out for each other out there?" SOIA's lead singer asked a diverse crowd full of Green Day T–shirts and straight–edge tattoos.

While testosterone–laden aggression was clearly the driving force behind songs like "Insurrection" and "Scratch The Surface" (the title track from the latest album), Sick Of It All maintained a genuine feeling of enthusiasm and crowd interaction which made their set such unabashed fun.

Additional costs turn Waterworld into sinking ship

By Patricia Bibby
Associated Press

KAWAIHAE, Hawaii — The trailers are already in movie theaters: Over a breathtaking panorama of a deeply turquoise Hawaiian sea, James Earl Jones ominously asks what would happen if the world were submerged beneath water.

CUT TO: Kevin Costner attempting to look noble with scraggly hair, gills and webbed feet. Faster editing quickens the pulse as nefarious jet–ski invaders slice across the screen.

A climax finally is reached and we learn the answer to Jones' question: It's Universal Pictures' staggeringly expensive Waterworld. And Jones' narration isn't the only thing that's ominous about this movie, the most expensive film ever made. The question looming large these days is whether Waterworld — with a price tag said to be around $150 million and rising — will be the summer blockbuster Universal needs. Will it follow in the aquatic footsteps of Universal's other watery hit thriller, Jaws? Or will it take a dive like the studio's Jonah? To break even, Waterworld must take in around $300 million at the domestic box office, according to Harold Vogel, entertainment analyst at Cowen and Co. in New York. How realistic is that? "Not very likely," he said.

Smith Barney senior analyst Chuck Goto agrees. Can Waterworld bring in $300 million? "That sounds like a tall order to me," he said.

Only two movies last year made $300 million or more: Forrest Gump and The Lion King. For a movie to be that popular, it practically has to add to the national lexicon, such as Gump's "life is like a box of chocolates" or E.T.'s "phone home." If nothing else, as The Lion King demonstrated, there need to be a lot of spinoff games and cuddly stuffed animals kids will demand at the top of their Christmas lists.

Universal plans some licensing with Waterworld, but studio spokesman Bruce Feldman said less merchandising was planned than with the megahit Jurassic Park, because the latter already was a best–selling book and hence better known.

Waterworld is not even in the can yet. Second–unit production, which covers shots that don't include the movie's stars, is continuing here while filmmakers wrap up in Los Angeles studios.

The production suffered an eleventh hour setback when a 40–foot high set piece, a "slave colony," sank Jan. 27, further holding up the shooting schedule.

Just getting Waterworld this far has been a high–profile, high–seas adventure that probably has caused more than a few of its principal players to

Lilys avoid dream–rock cliches with new album

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

ECCSAME THE PHOTON BAND
Lilys
SpinArt Records

Strange things are afoot in the Lilys' camp. For the past few years the band has been suffering from some sort of musical split personality. Their debut, In The Presence Of Nothing, released by Slumberland Records, established them as nothing more than one of the many My Bloody Valentine wannabees that litter the music–biz.

Then all of sudden the guys woke up a little from their dreamy haze and released the excellent A Brief History Of Amazing Letdowns EP. This found the band heading in a more structured direction, with a handful of Dinosaur Jr–influenced pop songs.

But don't think you have The Lilys pegged just yet. With their latest full–length release, Eccsame The Photon Band, it is clear that the band wants to have the best of both worlds. Eccsame is basically a beautiful hybrid of the band's first two releases, combining the lush dreaminess of their debut with the somewhat skewed pop sensibilities of their EP. The result is a distinctly original "shoe–gazer" album that artfully dodges any of that label's nasty connotations.

Eccsame The Photon Band does adhere to many of the tiresome "shoegazing principles" that bands like My Bloody Valentine and Slowdive established so many years ago. The obligatory ethereal vocals, layers of fuzzed–out guitars and often laboriously slow back beat are all here.

But unlike the aforementioned bands, the Lilys know that beneath all the noise, there has to be an actual song. Throughout the album they provide solid foundations for their lush sound–scapes and then garnish the whole thing with hints of vibraphone, synths and horns.

The result is a collage of sounds that almost resembles a fuller sounding Dark Side Of The Moon— era Pink Floyd without all the paranoid delusions.

With its dreamy, space–aged album cover and often cryptic song titles (i.e., "The Turtle Which Died Before Knowing," "Hubble Kodiak (Reprise)") it would be easy to dismiss Eccsame The Photon Band as just another boring head–trip into nowhere that so many other bands that follow this route invite their listeners on.

Yet, the Lilys know better than to just rely on a gimmicks or effects in order to get by, and that is what makes their music a dream worth slipping into. A– experience symptoms very much akin to seasickness.

Directed by Kevin Reynolds, whose only hit was Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves, Waterworld is a sort of soggy Road Warrior. It's post-apocalyptic: The world's icecaps have melted, flooding the Earth, and people have mutated into half-human, half-amphibian creatures.

To survive, a society scavenges floating debris and pieces it together to form an "atoll." This becomes the centerpiece for a conflict between Costner and perpetual Bad Guy Dennis Hopper. The movie also co-stars Jeanne Tripplehorn (Basic Instinct, The Firm) and Tina Majorino.

In actuality, filmmakers used Lockheed-designed floating platforms lashed together to create the atoll, a 400-foot doughnut-shaped entity that sat in 90 feet of water about a quarter-mile off the Kona coast of Hawaii, the southernmost Hawaiian island. The set, more than 1,000 tons of steel, had a scrappy, junkyard appearance; think of Cats meets Mad Max. But since production began last June, the conflicts and problems haven't been limited to the script, which wasn't even finished as initial production began.

To begin with, a tentative production schedule that was to last 96 days ballooned to 150.

Crew members complained of "total chaos" on the set, as well as a lack of management, said Doug Carr, whose company, Professional Divers Hawaii, helped build the underwater foundation. Carr left the production in September, saying his company was owed $82,000 and that Universal officials had offered to settle by paying only $25,000.

Universal spokesman Dave Fulton says Carr's company was "fully and fairly paid" for the underwater construction. "We can't comment on that further, based on the possibility of litigation," Fulton said.

Carr wasn't the only one grousing about the making of Waterworld. Earlier in production, assistant director Alan Curtiss walked off the set, reportedly over creative differences.

Warren Zevon will bring his unique brand of songwriting to the Pearl Street stage tomorrow night.

Zevon one of music's few originals

By Matthew Justin Foerber
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow night, Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton will be the sight of a rare performance from one of the truly unsung legends of modern American music, Warren Zevon. For twenty years, Zevon has been impressing critics and fans alike with his distinctive style of darkly emotional, often highly political rock.

Born in Chicago in 1947, Zevon began a career in music at an early age, his earliest aspirations were to become a classical composer and pianist. By the age of thirteen, he would frequently visit the famous Russian composer Igor Stravinsky in search of guidance and inspiration.

Then one day, Zevon decided to switch his focus to the world of rock and roll, picked up a guitar, and began delving into blues and folk, though never forgetting his childhood love of the piano.

The result of this combination of influences is powerful, intensely personal music. From eerie, brooding ballads like "Roland The Headless Thompson Gunner" to anthemic blues rock numbers like "I'll Sleep When I'm Dead" and "Lawyers, Guns, and Money," Zevon's songwriting is consistently potent and relevant.

His 1973 eponymous album was hailed by Time magazine as "one of the best albums of the decade" and its follow up Excitable Boy brought him a great deal of commercial success, spawning the international hit single "Werewolves Of London."

Over the course of his long, celebrated career, Zevon has recorded a total of twelve solo albums and has collaborated with everyone from Neil Young to Chick Corea. In 1990, he and three-quarters of R.E.M. (sans Michael Stipe) recorded a much lauded album of blues standards under the moniker The Hindu Love Gods.

Now Zevon is once again striking out on his own. His latest album, Learning To Flinch, features him playing the majority of the instruments and singing, and his current tour reflects this outlook.

"Playing solo gives me more opportunity to improvise," he explains.

In an age where so much of popular music is based on image and pretensions, Warren Zevon's musical integrity is a welcome breath of fresh air.

Local favorites The Ray Mason Band will open the show, with their brand of no-nonsense rock and roll.

Warren Zevon, with opening act The Ray Mason Band will be performing live tomorrow night at Pearl Street in Northampton. The show is 21+. For more information, call Pearl Street at 584-7771.

Program gives scholarships to students interested in field

By Chris Hassett

WELLESLEY — The Massachusetts Construction Advancement Program (MCAP) is offering up to $4,000 in scholarship aid to students with a vested interest in the construction field.

MCAP is offering this scholarship to promote professionalism in the construction industry and further the goals of students in collegiate construction programs, said Thurlow Wright, business manager of MCAP.

Due to the select group of students eligible for this scholarship, the number of applicants is usually low.

"Generally we get about 40 applicants a year," Wright said.

Award recipients will be selected by representatives of the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts Education Committee.

MCAP, a trust formed in 1973, is in its 20th year of awarding scholarships.

Nearly 130 students have been awarded $170,000 in scholarship grants since the inception of the program.

Students applying for the program must be in either their sophomore or junior year, must be a full-time student and must be a Massachusetts resident, Wright said.

Applicants must also be pursuing a Bachelors degree in construction, construction management or civil engineering.

The University offers neither construction nor construction management majors.

> "MCAP is offering this scholarship to promote professionalism in the construction industry and further the goals of students in collegiate construction programs."
> Thurlow Wright, business manager of MCAP

The University does offer a major in civil engineering, according to Rich Toomey, an assistant director of undergraduate admissions.

Beyond requiring a transcript and employment history, MCAP asks such questions as what has been the applicant's favorite extracurricular activity and why the applicant is interested in construction.

Applicants are also asked how previous work experiences would relate to a future construction career.

Neither the applicant's personal financial status nor the status of the applicant's parents is a factor in choosing the recipient of the scholarship.

All applications are due by April 1.

Those awarded scholarships will be informed by the end of May. Scholarship awards will be presented in September.

MCAP scholarship applications can be picked up at the University Financial Aid office.

Max hits fan, RI hopes to keep Pats

BOSTON (AP) — Rhode Island, home of the New England Patriots' training camp, has joined Massachusetts in seeking a commitment from team owner Robert Kraft that he won't move the team before spending state money.

The Rhode Island Sports Council, a public-private group, wants Kraft to agree to have the team continue to hold its summer training camp at Bryant College in Smithfield, R.I., for at least five years.

Without that commitment, a plan to spend $200,000 to build stands and make other improvements may be dropped, John Mousseau, council executive director, told the Boston Herald.

Last week, Massachusetts Gov. William F. Weld said he wanted a guarantee from Kraft that he would keep the Patriots in Massachusetts for at least 10 years in exchange for state money to improve Foxboro Stadium and other help, the Boston Herald said today.

Weld is preparing a package of proposals to help the Patriots, and it is expected to include a training facility and year-around office building at the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

Kraft has proposed a $20 million facility at the university and has the backing of Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, who said that could benefit the team, the university and community groups.

The Patriots have held summer training at Bryant for 18 years, reportedly paying $120,000 in rent for the six-week camp last year.

Vernon Maxwell punches fan

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — "Mad Max" is in trouble again, this time for allegedly punching a fan in the face during an NBA game.

Houston's Vernon Maxwell, a temperamental guard with a history of off-court troubles, charged 10 rows into the stands and, according to witnesses, punched a fan during the third quarter of Monday night's 120-82 loss to the Portland Trail Blazers.

The NBA said Rod Thorn, vice president-operations, was reviewing the incident today, and would have no immediate comment. But 35-year-old fan Steve George said he will press charges.

"He hit me square," George said as he held an ice pack to the left side of his jaw. "I was hit by an NBA player in the face while I was sitting in row L and I'm not happy."

Robert Horry and Rockets assistant coach Larry Smith chased Maxwell into the crowd. All three were thrown out of the game.

Manning hurts knee, out for season

PHOENIX (AP) — Danny Manning is out for the rest of the season, and perhaps longer.

Manning, a forward for the Phoenix Suns, tore the anterior cruciate ligament in his left knee during practice Tuesday when he stepped on center Joe Kleine's foot. Manning had a similar injury to his right knee in 1989.

"It's a minimum of eight months, and it could be up to a year, but we're looking, at the earliest, this coming October for him to be back playing basketball," Suns president Jerry Colangelo said.

Strawberry tests positive for cocaine

WASHINGTON (AP) — Darryl Strawberry tested positive for cocaine on consecutive days last month, according to documents obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press.

Strawberry was suspended by major league baseball Monday for 60 days for violating the game's drug policy and terms of his aftercare program. The San Francisco Giants immediately released him.

Strawberry missed the first two months of the 1994 season after admitting to a substance abuse problem and seeking treatment. Although there was speculation at the time that it was a cocaine problem, it was never officially confirmed by representatives of baseball or Strawberry.

A letter sent by acting commissioner Bud Selig to Strawberry at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., last week informed the outfielder that "on Jan. 17 and 18, 1995, you submitted urine samples which tested positive for an illegal drug."

GW up next — The Colonial Women come in nationally ranked No. 16. They are tied for first place in the A-10 with the Minutewomen with a 8-1 record. Their only league loss was a narrow 75-74 setback to Rutgers. The winner of the game will take over sole possession of first place and likely gain the No. 1 seed in the A-10 tournament barring any further losses in the league.

Around the rim — Carroll's double-double against Rutgers (18 points, 14 rebounds) was the fourth of her career and first of the season...UMass has a 9-1 record when Carroll scores in double figures...UMass' seven-game winning streak is the longest under O'Brien...The 8-1 start in the A-10 is the best ever in school history.

The Minutewomen are 7-0 at home. They are the only team in the A-10 to have a perfect home record...UMass is holding its opponents to 35.4 percent shooting from the field, tops in the A-10...The Minutewomen are shooting an A-10 leading 46.5 percent from the floor...In her 12 starts, Hopson has led UMass to 11 victories. With her seven assists against West Virginia Feb. 2, she moved into the top 10 on the UMass career assists chart. She now has 183 career assists.

Michigan State has a superstar in Shawn Respert but a subpar conference schedule, leaving the Spartans disappointed with a No. 2 seed. The down year in the Big Ten will hurt State's chances at a No. 1.

The No. 3 and No. 4 seeds in this regional have the potential to make a run at the Final Four. Randolph Childress' Wake Forest team is young and battle-tested after surviving the ACC; the Deacons deserve a No. 3.

The Villanova roller coaster should be climbing another hill when the tournament approaches and, if Kerry Kittles busts out, look out America.

Eastern Regional

If North Carolina survives the ACC tourney, the Tar Heels will be an overwhelming choice for the No. 1 seed in the East. Keep the Heels in the East, like they always do. Could be the swan song for both Rasheed Wallace and Jerry Stackhouse.

Massachusetts is the No. 2 seed in the East and is ready for a trip to Albany, N.Y., only an hour away from its campus and an easy trip for Minuteman fans.

Big East runner-up Syracuse will be the No. 3 and on a collision course with the Minutemen for the second time in four years. Georgia Tech takes the No. 4 seed and the NCAA committee hopes James Forrest shines.

Parting Shots

Best possible scenario for Massachusetts is:

- North Carolina loses in the ACC tourney.
- Villanova wins the Big East tourney.
- Massachusetts only loses one more time until NCAAs and gets a No. 1 seed.

The Big Ten doesn't have a quality team besides Michigan State and will suffer in the tournament ... Scott Drapeau and the New Hampshire Wildcats will win the North Atlantic and play Massachusetts in the first round. Drapeau will wish he'd never left Amherst during the 1991-92 season...If Joe Smith, Rasheed Wallace and Jerry Stackhouse all come out after this season, they'll go in that order (1, 2, 3) in June's NBA Draft. Stackhouse will bring about memories of the last Tar Heel to be taken third — Michael Jordan.

She also won the 200 yard backstroke (2:13.36) and the 200 individual medley (2:13.41).

■ NBA

Mashburn and Jimmy Jackson can credit Kidd for their 20-plus ppg averages. While the rookie point guard has yet to develop a shot (37 percent from the field), the Mavericks can deal with it for now. His passing and defense are a step up from many of the point guards in the league, and the shooting should improve.

Kidd has been raved about since his high school days in California, and he has received raved reviews so far in his short NBA career.

Jamal Mashburn and Jimmy Jackson — They do have the Kidd to thank for their boosted scoring averages, but give these players themselves some credit. The argument is there that they are the only scoring threats in Dallas these days, but their respective averages (24.5 and 26.3) show just how dangerous Jamal and Jimmy are.

All you real NBA fans can look back to the early '80s and find Alex English and Kiki Vandeweghe did the same thing in Denver. Take it from me — Mashburn and Jackson have better all around games than those pure shooters.

Eddie Jones — A familiar face around here, as he tormented UMass throughout his four-year career at Temple. Now, he's doing some damage in the NBA for the Lakers, and Coach Del Harris is ecstatic.

Harris said that much of Jones' success has to do with the tutelage he received under one John Chaney. The "boot-camp"-like atmosphere, according to Harris, has aided Jones in his development as an NBA player.

Nice to see, and much of a testament to his college coach.

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Find practical users for your best ideas. Returning phone calls promptly will keep you from missing out on a golden opportunity. Take steps to secure a secret document.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Be evasive financial policies with an eye to getting more for your money. Resting on your laurels will allow the competition to pass you by. Consult a lawyer before signing contracts.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): You are entering a highly dynamic period for your professional ambitions. Better job conditions are on the way. You have a chance to step into the limelight.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Your family and friends affect your financial fortunes now. Make whatever progress you can on your own. No matter how hard you try, certain loved ones may be difficult to please. Defend your beliefs.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Take up a special project and see how far you can go with it. The presence of your loved ones will boost your spirits sky-high! Heed your intuition if determined to overrule your elders.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Guard against being taken in by someone's false promises or dubious values. Recklessness could cause serious mishaps. Handling your financial affairs in the most discreet manner possible will protect vital secrets.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): One good idea leads to another today. You come up with something original and worthwhile. Check with the experts before signing a long- term rental agreement. A new home or car is a possibility.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Happiness should reign in a key relationship this week. Adopt new business policies that will ensure customer satisfaction for a long time. Keep up with the march of events, stretching whatever limits you can.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): An academic or technical course could make you more attractive to a prospective employer. A handshake is often impossible to enforce. Get agreements in writing.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): A good day for detail work and research projects. Be considerate of your friends and other close allies. Compose old grievances before launching new ones. Romance proves challenging tonight.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Buckle down to work. You have a greater need for cash than prestige. Curb a tendency to be extravagant. A glamorous romance may become too expensive. Be candid. True love means being willing to make sacrifices.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March. 20): Expressing your creative and artistic talents should be a top priority now. A shared interest draws you closer to someone you love. Do not try to go it alone in business. Strengthen a promising alliance.

Halftime sit-in by Rutgers' students suspends game

By Tom Canavan
Associated Press

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — Students protesting racially inflammatory comments by Rutgers president Francis Lawrence staged a halfcourt sit-in last night, causing the suspension of a basketball game between No. 4 Massachusetts and Rutgers.

The protest started with a black female student sitting at the jump ball circle just before the second half was to begin. Security guards came out to talk to her, but the protest escalated after two minutes and more than 150 students, nearly all black, eventually sat on the floor.

Police and university officials negotiated briefly with the students, while the sellout crowd of mostly whites shouted, "Get of the court" and "We want hoops" to those on the court.

Atlantic 10 commissioner Linda Bruno, citing safely concerns, ordered the game suspended 24 minutes later and the crowd of 8,526 was asked the leave Rutgers Athletic Center. Rutgers was leading 31–29.

Massachusetts coach John Calipari and Rutgers coach Bob Wenzel were asked to take their teams to their locker rooms shortly after the sit-in started. The teams were taken out of the building after the game was suspended at 9:37 p.m. the court was cleared of protesters and fans left the stands at 10 p.m.

Lawrence, who was not at the game, has been sharply criticized by many university students and faculty, as well as state legislators, for his comments last fall that minorities don't have the genetic background to do well on college entrance exams.

Attempts to reach Lawrence or a university representative familiar with the protest were not immediately successful last night.

As students sat on the basketball court, several others circled them, carrying banners assailing Lawrence.

"How do we deal with an intellectually disadvantaged president? We fire him," read one.

A long banner with one word per line read, "$208,000 mansion chauffeur servants chefs appointed not elected," and one referring to Gov. Christie Whitman and Rutgers University made a pun: "Whitman Where R U?".

"The students are not satisfied with the answers they got from president Lawrence," Roselle Wilson, Rutgers' vice president of student affairs, told a television interviewer: "They do want to make this statement in a public way."

Athletic Director Fred Gruniger then walked to announcer Jim Wilson and had him tell the crowd the game was suspended.

Wilson, Gruninger and Bruno all said that they had known beforehand there was a possibility students would protest.

Wilson said school officials Monday night heard rumors of a protest and prepared for it by adding extra security. Wilson said a university policy prohibited removing the protesters as long as they were peaceful. She also said she had not spoken with Francis since the protest began.

Wilson said the students had requested a microphone to address the crowd, but were denied because they would not promise to leave if they made the statement.

The contest was declared an "interrupted game," which means it can be continued. Bruno said both coaches wanted to complete the game. How that could be done, or whether Rutgers might have to forfeit, was to be discussed Wednesday.

Both teams were immediately put on buses for their own safety after the game was suspended, and the University of Massachusetts team departed quickly.

Lawrence's speech in Camden on Nov. 11 was made public last week by members of Rutgers' faculty union.

Lawrence did not question the accuracy of the tape of his speech, but said he didn't mean what he said and regretted the comment.

A handful of legislators and many Rutgers students and staff have been calling for Lawrence's ouster, but some members of the university community have supported him, saying his record of recruiting minority faculty and students show he is not racist.

On Monday, about a dozen Rutgers administrators, students and the son of Paul Robeson — the actor, singer, civil rights activist and Rutgers graduate — held a campus news conference to express their support for Lawrence.

PISCATAWAY, N.J. – More than 100 Rutgers University students stage a sit-In at half court causing the interruption of the Massachusetts Rutgers Atlantic 10 Conference basketball game in Piscataway, N.J. yesterday. A young woman began the sit in and was soon joined by more than 100 students protesting racially inflammatory comments made by university President Francis Lawrence.

Also Monday, Shirley Turner, a black New Jersey assemblywoman, called Lawrence's remark an "ugly, senseless and needless incident" that was just as wounding as the remarks made by Nation of Islam spokesman Khalid Muhammad. His racist, anti-Semitic speeches at state colleges last year sparked widespread controversy and were condemned by the assembly.

Penny's money, Kidd no rookie

Andrew Bryce

The National Basketball Association has admittedly bored me over the past few years. It was a transition period. Down went Magic, down went Bird, down went Jordan. The three players who owned the NBA throughout the '80s and early '90s were out of the league just like that, and the league had to refurbish with new talent.

Not that the league lacked talent, it just needed some fresh young faces. The Olajawons, the Barkleys, the Ewings and the Robinsons are still around, but few others had stepped up into their echelon once the Big Three ran for retirement.

This year is looking up. Young talent is now in abundance, and the flavor of the league has become tastier. The kinds of layers that will carry the torch through the '90s and into the year 2000. Here's some players that have peaked my interest as of late. Keep it in mind that not all of these guys will dominate the league, but the league's crop has risen with the emergence of these players.

Anfernee Hardaway — You give me any player to start a team, I'll take this Memphis product. A 6-foot–8–inch point guard? Sound familiar? The Orlando Magic point guard is being compared to that Magic guy that used to play for the Los Angeles Lakers, and rightfully so.

His passing is gorgeous, and he's the Magic's go–to–guy in just his third season. And he has Shaq Fu down in the paint, a perfect fit, a la Magic Johnson and Kareem Abdul Jabbar in the '80s.

One things for sure: this Penny is worth millions — and, quite possibly a couple of NBA rings in the near future.

Glenn Robinson — Just when the critics wanted to consider him a bust, Robinson has turned it on. One of the best college players these eyes have seen, the "Big Dawg" has come on as of late, raising his average to 20.3 ppg after hanging around the 14 ppg mark through much of the first half of the season.

Robinson was actually part of a trade talk, a possible swap for Scottie Pippen. C'mon Milwaukee. Don't screw up a good thing. Build around the rookie star, don't get that crybaby, Jordan–wanna be in town. The Bucks have a young, promising squad looking toward the future. Chemistry is key, and Scottie Pippen wouldn't know team chemistry if it hit him in the face.

Dana Barros — One thing was missing for Barros when he was in Seattle — playing time. The Sixers accommodated the BC–alum, and he has turned into an all–star. The numbers speak for themselves — 20.6 ppg, 7.4 apg. Albeit not the strongest team in Philadelphia, but there's finally someone to work around.

Barros is not an NBA superstar, and may never be. But he is living proof that some players really do need a change of residence to emerge. And emerge Barros has done.

Jason Kidd — The ultimate play–maker. Jamal

Women's hoop gears for bid

■ Surging Minutewomen have realistic shot at post-season NCAA tournament selection

At the start of the season the UMass Minutewomen had NCAA aspirations. But after starting the season with five straight losses, those hopes looked all but gone.

Now, after winning 13 of their last 14 games, a NCAA bid is a realistic possibility. If the Minutewomen can beat George Washington on Saturday, keep winning, and make some noise in the Atlantic 10 tournament, they should get consideration. If they can win the tournament, they'll almost certainly get in.

"I think we have to win the rest of our games and the A– 10's if we want to make it to the NCAAs," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said.

Minutewoman Notes

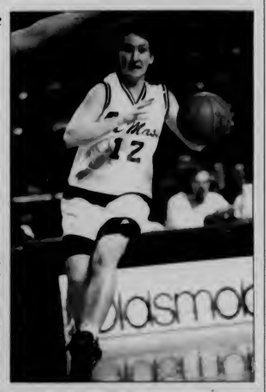
Carroll on fire — In the last five games, Crystal Carroll has been the story. She has scored at least 17 points in each game dating back to Dartmouth (Jan. 25). Three times she has hit for over 20 points, including a career–high 28 against West Virginia (Feb. 2).

Her 14 rebounds against Rutgers set a also set a career– high, making it four games in a row that she has set a career–high in some category. Carroll set a career–high in assists (6) against Duquesne (Jan. 28), in free throws (10) and attempts (13) against St. Bonaventure (Jan. 30), in field goals (11) and attempts (16) along with her 28 points against West Virginia (Feb. 2), and in steals (4) and blocks (3, ties her high) along with her 14 boards against Rutgers.

After playing so well against weaker teams, Carroll wanted to show everyone that she could do the same against tougher opponents.

"I was nervous because I didn't know what people were going to expect from me. People were kind of wondering if I could do what I did against West Virginia in a big game like Rutgers," Carroll said.

Hitting them from the charity stripe — The Minutewomen have been hitting their free throws. In the NCAA statistical leaders released on Jan. 31, UMass was No. 2 in the nation and the Atlantic 10 with a free throw percentage of 75.8.



CHRIS RACUSA / COLLEGIAN

Tricia Hopson has played an instrumental role in the Minutewomen winning 13 of their last 14 games.

Currently, the Minutewomen are hitting 76.2 percent from the line. St. Bonaventure leads the nation and the conference with a 78.3 free throw percentage. Four of the five current starters– Melissa Gurile (82.1), Octavia Thomas (78.5), Carroll (80.6) and Tricia Hopson (71.4),– are shooting over 70 percent from the line.

Men's track finishes second, Farley top swimmer

UMass' Sports Briefs

The University of Massachusetts men's track team placed second this weekend at a quad meet at the University of Rhode Island.

Rhode Island won the meet scoring 82 points, while Massachusetts' 65 points were good for second. Central Connecticut (7) and Hartford (5) finished a distant third and fourth.

Freshman Scott Price continued his impressive rookie campaign. Price, who has already qualified for the IC4A's in the 200 meters, qualified for the meet in the 55 meter hurdles as well.

Senior John Johnson had not been outleaped this season, going into the meet. His jump off of 22', 2 1/2 inches kept the streak alive.

Marc Lefevbre won the shot put with his season best throw of 48–feet 3–inches.

Other first place finishers for UMass were senior Tom Galligani (triple jump, 44–feet 1 inch), senior Ron Tauro (55 meter hurdles 7.8) and Matt Behl (3000 meters 8:50.30).

The Minutemen return to action on Saturday, when they return to Rhode Island for the Atlantic 10 conference Championships.

Farley named Swimmer of the Week

Sophomore Jessica Farley, of the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team was named Swimmer of the Week by the New England Intercollegiate Swimming and Diving association.

"I'm excited. She deserves it," Coach Bob Newcomb said. "She has been swimming tremendously. Her performance since January, against UConn, BC and at the Rhode Island invitational has been wonderful."

In the Minutewomen's 150–150 tie

Early look at tourney sees UNC No. 1 seed in East, UMass No. 2

Like sand through an hourglass, so are the days of our college basketball regular season. It's already February, and before you blink, they'll be revealing the magical field of 64 in Overland Park, Kan.

But, I'll do it first — here are the top four seeds for each region and some special surprises along the way.

Western Regional

This is the year of an improved Pac–10 Conference. Period. Unlike in past years, the No. 1 seed in the West will come from the west, the UCLA Bruins. Jim Harrick may not be much of a coach, but he has too much talent not to escape the conference post–season unscathed.

Arthur Stapleton, Jr.

Because of their recent history, the O'Bannon Bruins will be touted as a weak No. 1 and picked by many as an eventual victim of the upset.

With a weak No. 1 comes a strong No. 2 in the form of the defending national champion, Arkansas. The Razorbacks should impress in the SEC tourney with a rematch looming against Kentucky. Corliss Williamson, Scottie Thurman and Corey Beck are dangerous players to count out. Don't put your money on many other teams being a stronger No. 2.

Maryland is a top–notch team which will benefit from a tough out–of–conference schedule and its torturous ACC tilts. The Terps have the best player in the country (Joe Smith) and are in line to finish in second place in the best league in America.

A strong No. 4 seed is Arizona State, which could grab an even higher position if the Devils can make waves in the post–season tourney.

Midwest Regional

The strongest team in the Big 8 deserves this No. 1 and it will be Kansas. There may not be a better backcourt in the country than Jacque Vaughn and Jerod Haase, a better coach than Roy Williams, or a bigger surprise this season than the success of the Jayhawks. Their complementary players have really stepped up and with the Big 8 championship and wins over Massachusetts and Connecticut, Kansas gets the top spot.

The No. 2 will be those UConn Huskies, who still have tough Big East games against Syracuse, Georgetown and Villanova in the regular season. Their conference isn't as good as advertised, leaving Connecticut as another strong two in the Dance.

Arizona will snag the No. 3 seed in the Midwest, setting up a great showdown between the Wildcats and Huskies somewhere along the line. The No. 4 will be Virginia, who will ride the wave of the ACC to a high seed.

Southeast Regional

The team has been making a run to a No. 1 seed is Kentucky. The Wildcats will beat Arkansas in the SEC Final and garner the top spot in the Southeast. Tony Delk will be a name to watch come March.

SGA appoints senate at meeting; agenda for tuition discussed

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students representing different groups from the community were appointed as senators to the Student Government Association (SGA) last night at the opening meeting of the semester.

The 14 new senators include students from residence halls, members of the Greek system and commuters who will be working with SGA on such projects as battling tuition increases.

According to the SGA Constitution, senators, who each represent 250 or more people, must attend all senate meetings and keep their constituents informed by distributing a communique to their constituency and to the associate speaker twice a semester.

A number of senators were removed from their positions over winter break, most for non–attendance of meetings, said Speaker of the House Mercedes Betanco.

Senators sworn in

The new senators affirmed to "faithfully execute the office of SGA senator and support the Constitution and By–laws of the Student Government Association."

"Take it seriously," Betanco said after the senators gave their oath. "I hope you are ready for some work."

"This is a progressive step to filling the senate," said Tom Darby, associate speaker. "There are 105 positions in total, and 55 are open. There is a big push for students who are interested and any group that is not represented to get involved in senate."

Darby, who has been with the senate for four years, said he has seen it evolve.

"Senate used to be run more like a club — it had mostly republican, White male members," Darby said.

According to Darby, there has not been much diversity in the senate for a number of years, referring to the women, African Americans and various ethnic groups who make up the present senate.

More students are needed to represent their student concerns, said Betanco, who is looking for additional women to join the senate.

"I joined senate because I need to find out more about major issues, like tuition, and get involved," said Jennifer Flanagan, a sophomore sociology major who was appointed senator representing Cance Residence Hall.

Possible tuition hike

Possible government cuts to higher education and increases in tuition and fees were pressing issues for the new senators.

UMass students react to protest at Rutgers; BSU applauds action

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Although many fans at the Rutgers–University of Massachusetts men's basketball game may not have received Tuesday's game–ending student protest with open arms, it seems many of their UMass counterparts support the demonstrators' actions.

Several UMass students voiced opinions yesterday strongly in favor of the means by which the activists made their cause known on a national level.

The sit–down demonstration two days ago by nearly 200 Rutgers students, mostly Black representatives from the United Student Coalition (USC) of the New Brunswick, N.J. school, was a response to an allegedly racist remark made by Rutgers President Francis Lawrence.

"It was the best move for them to get their case heard," Shelly Monstur said.

Demand Lawrence's resignation

Despite Lawrence's apology, students could not ignore the nature of the comment, which pertained to the genetic background of minorities correlating with poor performances on college entrance exams.

A single woman sitting in center court at the Rutgers Athletic Center began the USC protest, which ultimately led to the postponement of the game before the start of the second half.

The USC has presented the institution with a list of demands, one of which asks for the removal of Lawrence from office.

Many students at UMass sided with the drastic measures taken by the Rutgers demonstrators.

"It was the best move for them to get their case heard," sophomore Shelly Monstur said.

"I was quite surprised," said Patrick Murphy, a junior. "They certainly picked the right spot. For the comments [Lawrence] made, the students were definitely justified."

BSU announces support

Also sympathetic to the Rutgers protesters was Rigoberto Nuñez, a back–up forward for the UMass team.

"To say that Blacks are inferior in testing is wrong," Nuñez, a junior, said. "They're people just like anybody else. I would have been disappointed if [the students] hadn't done what they did."

Soon after they had received word of Tuesday night's controversy, the Black Student Union of UMass issued a press statement echoing the sentiment of their Rutgers peers.

"Those same people who stood up and shouted, 'We want hoops,' would be the same to say, 'It's great that you can dribble that basketball' if we weren't saying anything," said senior Taft Bailey, director of public relations for the BSU.

"But as soon as Black people are proactive, they don't want to see that."

Wrong place, wrong time?

But some UMass students did not agree with the activists' method of making their statement.

"If [the students] had a legitimate gripe they should have gone through the proper channels because they ruined the game for the entire crowd," said Paul Ferro, president of the UMass Republican Club. "But in terms of effectiveness, it was a success."

"It was the wrong place and the wrong time to do it," sophomore Joshua Bows said. "If they were going to do it, they should have done it elsewhere."

Others said they felt the forum, a competition involving a nationally ranked team, was particularly effective.

"You gotta do what you gotta do," said junior Todd Sibley said. "If you have to use the popularity of college athletics, no matter what the consequences are, then that is the best way to get the point across."

Foster triples number of abortions performed

By Nita Lelyveld
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Surgeon General nominee Henry Foster said Wednesday night he performed 39 abortions in his career as a gynecologist-obstetrician — more than three times as many as he stated previously.

But the embattled Foster added, "I abhor abortion."

The admission came in an interview on ABC's "Nightline" with Ted Koppel that was taped in the Roosevelt Room of the White House. Foster said he was pressured last week by administration officials to come up with an estimate on how many abortions he had performed.

Last Friday, the day after his nomination was announced by President Clinton, he put the number at fewer than a dozen.

Foster, a former dean and acting president of Meharry Medical College in Nashville, Tenn., said he had worked furiously over the past three days going through the records of his career to pinpoint the number of abortions he had performed.

A search of hospital records showed "I was listed as the physician of record on 39 of those cases in 38 years in practice and 22 years at Meharry."

He also presided over a study of vaginal suppository to induce early abortions. Foster said 55 of the 60 women in that study had abortions but "these were not patients I knew. They weren't my private patients...Many times I was not even in the country when these were done."

"I abhor abortions. I abhor war. To me, abortion is failure; I don't like failure," Foster said on the TV show, his first comments in public since his nomination.

But he defended the training residents at Meharry on abortion techniques, saying, "We have a responsibility to teach all residents to manage the complications of abortion."

Senators criticizing the nomination generally were focusing on questions of credibility — had Foster told the truth about the number of abortions he had performed? Had the White House misled lawmakers? — than on Foster or the abortions themselves.

Some Democrats and Republicans sounded oddly alike, simply wanting the controversy to go away.

"They would be well advised to find someone everybody could live with," said Republican Sen. Phil Gramm of Texas, a presidential hopeful. "There are thousands of doctors."

"They should have taken the finest doctor they could find in the country, someone near retirement without any controversy," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del. "It's not like this is the only doctor in the world."

Clinton opposes rewrite of '94 crime law

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Majority Republicans moved to rewrite the 1994 crime law Wednesday, drawing fire from President Clinton, who promised he will oppose GOP tinkering that thwarts his goal of putting 100,000 more cops on the streets.

Surrounded by law enforcement officers, Clinton denounced infringements on the 1994 act and announced a new grant to hire more police.

"I will oppose any attempt to undermine the capacity of the crime bill to produce the 100,000 police officers that we promised the country," Clinton said.

The House passed two anti-crime bills Wednesday, loosening rules on court use of unlawfully seized evidence and imposing a one-year limit for death row inmates to file appeals of their state sentences to federal courts.

The bills are elements of a six-part anti-crime package the GOP leadership insists is needed to put more teeth in the $30 billion crime law enacted last year. The anti-crime legislation is part of the House GOP's "Contract With America."

"Convicted murderers on death row regularly make a mockery of the criminal justice system by using every trick in the book to delay the imposition of their sentence," Rep. Bill McCollum, R-Fla., said of the measure setting a one-year limit on federal appeals in capital cases. The bill passed 297-132.

Opponents claimed the bill takes away the rights of a detained person to be brought before a court to decide the legality of his detention. "Today we're not just suspending it, we're ripping it to shreds," Thomas Foglietta, D-Pa., said of the habeas corpus right.

In a bill condemned by Democrats as violating Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable search and seizure, the House voted 289-142 to allow wider use of certain unlawfully obtained evidence.

The bill gives prosecutors in federal courts added power to use evidence gathered by law enforcement officers acting in "good faith," whether or not they had a valid search warrant.

Taking advantage of a rare crack in GOP unity, Rep. Harold Volkmer, D-Mo., pushed through an amendment, by a 228-198 vote, that excludes the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms from such relaxed rules on evidence.

Volkmer, an ardent gun-control opponent, called the BATF "one of the most Rambo, rogue law enforcement agencies in the United States." With backing from the National Rifle Association, the amendment picked up 73 Republican votes despite opposition from the GOP leadership.

Students asked to help clean up buildings

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The Campus Beautification Committee has set their winter goal on sprucing up buildings at the University of Massachusetts.

"Have a Heart, Lend a Hand" entails cleaning and repainting, according to Kathleen Scott, co-chair of the committee and wife of Chancellor David K. Scott.

"This is going to be a great way to bring the students, staff and faculty together to participate in something that benefits everybody," said Felice Cohen, a staff member from the New Students Program and the other co-chair of the project.

This is the second project undertaken by the committee this academic year. The first project was the dredging of the campus pond last fall.

"Have a Heart, Lend a Hand" will take place Feb. 14 and 15 from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. Volunteers can register to help throughout the cleanup.

"This is the resuscitation of an old campaign to upgrade the campus through volunteer labor," Scott said. "We hope people will turn out and help the campus look better."

This "old campaign" was called "Mass Transformation," Scott said.

"About a year ago, a group of people from the campus community, including faculty, staff and students, and a few from the Amherst area, decided to consider various projects that could be done by volunteer labor," she said.

Albert D. Potter, head of grounds and transportation for the Physical Plant and a faculty member of the committee, would like to see the campus "looking in tip-top shape."

"The first 200 people to sign up get a free cap," Potter said. The hard-hat painter's cap has a white background in maroon lettering it says "Mass Transformation." Complimentary refreshments will also be served to volunteers.

"We're hoping to get around 250 people," Scott said. "We want the campus looking the best it can."

The group intends to organize a third project for the spring but has not decided what task to undertake. Potter has suggested the planting of flowers around campus, but the committee is open to suggestions.

The lobby of Worcester Dining Commons is one site targeted for beautification, in part because it's where "8,000 prospective high school students in the spring eat" while touring the University, Cohen said.

Other buildings slated for cleanup are Memorial Hall, Hasbrouck laboratory, the Lederle Graduate Research Centers, Bartlett and Herter Halls, and the hallway leading from the Student Union to the Campus Center, Scott said.

According to Potter, volunteers will start the project at Memorial Hall and move on to other sites from there. Potter is in charge of overseeing the progression from building to building.

"We're hoping to get around 250 people," she said. "We want the campus looking the best it can."

Campus Perspectives

What is your opinion of the Campus Center food services?

"I wish Earthfoods wouldn't use paper plates. It seems contradictory. The way I see it, it's a waste of a natural resource. But Bluewall has pretty good cookies."
— COREY GRINNELL, SENIOR, WILDLIFE FISHERIES, ATTLEBORO

"I think it's pretty good. Good selection. You can go from junk food to healthy food. Earthfoods has good rice, kale and salad.– That's better for you. It's more nutritious. And then you have the Hatch where you can get chips, hamburgers or fries."
— MELISSA MITCHELL, SENIOR, PSYCHOLOGY, BATON ROUGE, LA.

"I guess I pretty much like them. Bluewall has a good selection of coffees and cookies. Coffee's expensive everywhere nowadays. But I like it. The service is okay. They bring me my coffee when I ask."
— WILLIAM HALL, JUNIOR, ECONOMICS, NEWARK, OHIO

"It's a lot of variety and for the most part it's nice because there are various places you can go so it's not cafeteria– style. I like Earthfoods and Wok on the Wild Side. It's good for when my car's broken down and I have no choice but to eat."
— JAMIE NALEPINSKI, JUNIOR, NUTRITION, MILLERS FALLS

"My opinion of the Campus Center food services would have to be it is horrible. The Hatch's food doesn't taste good and I'd like to know exactly what's in the food. They have heat lamps so they're not even really cooking the chicken and hamburgers. What's its nutritional value? It's the same type of food I'd be eating in the D.C., but I'm paying more. And the price is ludicrous for the quality."
— TODD FIORETTI, JUNIOR, FILM, BROOKVILLE, N.Y.

"It's average. I don't really eat here that often. The coffee shop is the only place with good vegetarian food."
— JULIE REYNOLDS, JUNIOR, ART, FRAMINGHAM

"Students need to be aware that tuition and fees may go up, and what is being done," Betanco said.

The present work of students involved with Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) is very important, according to Betanco.

Students from community colleges, state colleges and universities all over Massachusetts joined together to define an agenda regarding the state budget, tuition and fees of their individual institutions, said Lynn Robitaille, student coordinator for SCERA.

Student trustee Al Lizana stressed the importance of a press conference at the statehouse on Monday where students will announce their agenda.

Any students interested in attending the press conference or becoming involved in SGA can visit the group's offices in room 420 of the Student Union.

*Deferred Apple Computer Loan offer expires February 17, 1995. No payment of interest or principal will be required for 90 days. (Some resellers may require a deposit to hold merchandise while loan is being approved.) Interest accruing during this 90-day period will or added to principal, and the principal amount, as so increased, will thereafter bear interest which will be included in the repayment schedule. *Monthly payment is an estimate based on a purchase price of $1,933.52, which includes 8.5% sales tax, for the Macintosh Performa 636CD system shown above. Including loan fee, the total loan amount is $2,044.00, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $33.50. The monthly payment above was calculated using an estimate of sales tax in San Francisco. If the applicable sales tax is 8.75% (Chicago) or 70% (Philadelphia), the monthly payment would be $33.58 or $33.04, respectively. Computer system prices, loan amounts and sales taxes may vary. See your authorized Apple Campus Reseller or representative for current system prices, loan and tax amounts. Loans are for a minimum of $1,000 to a maximum of $10,000. You may take out more than one loan, but the total of all loans cannot exceed $10,000 annually. A 5.5% loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount. The interest rate is variable, based on the commercial paper rate plus 3.35%. For the month of November, 1994, the interest rate was 10.85% and the Annual Percentage Rate was 12.64%. 5-year loan terms with no prepayment penalty. The monthly payment and the annual percentage rate shown assumes the 90-day deferment of principal and interest described above and no other deferment of principal or interest. Students may defer principal payments up to 4 years, or until graduation. Deferment will change your monthly payments. The Apple Computer Loan is subject to credit approval. Apple Computer Loan and 90-Day Deferred Payment Plan offers available only to qualifying students, faculty and staff. Opinion/Editorial

BSU applauds Rutgers

Last night in what is an illustration of the resolve and commitment of the students of color at Rutgers University, they were able to cause the postponement of their basketball game against the Minutemen. The University of Massachusetts Black Student Union would like to stand and applaud the efforts of the students at Rutgers University.

The students at Rutgers feel the same frustration students feel here at the University of Massachusetts and at institutions all over this nation. Such a protest should never be construed to be an attack at the athletes of either of the teams, but rather as a form of civil disobedience aimed at expressing the discontent and frustration of students of color.

Such frustration is echoed not only at UMass, but at institutions of higher learning all over this nation. When will we as a nation reach the crucial mass at which racism will no longer be accepted?

The University of Massachusetts Black Student Union will continue to follow the events at Rutgers, and at present are actively attempting to see in what way we can assist our brothers and sisters. We hope those students involved will not receive harsh repercussions for their actions, for we here at UMass might be forced to show our solidarity with those students involved. We stand with them, and say "Amen" to their efforts because we know they are not just protesting for themselves, or their university — they are protesting for young people of color all over this nation who just wish to matter in this society.

Shomwa Shamapande

We too echo the demands of the students at Rutgers and ask that the university fire President Francis Lawrence for his inappropriate statement. Anything less is an endorsement of views which are an ancient eyesore on the American landscape.

Shomwa Shamapande is the Black Student Union President.

Bullets don't solve problem of abortion

Half a century ago, columnist Dorothy Thompson complained of being habitually told she had "the brains of a man." Her strength, she insisted, was "altogether female."

Excuse me for wearing my gender on my sleeve, but I was forced into thinking "altogether female" when I heard of the events in Brookline on Dec. 30, 1994. I happened to be at a bar in Cleveland's airport when the local news team recounted the acts allegedly committed by John Salvi. The 22-year-old is accused of killing two women's clinic workers and injuring five others, all in the name of the pro-life movement.

The women at the bar — strangers just moments earlier — looked at one another in that "altogether female" light. My thoughts made for an interesting return flight into Hartford.

Ironic as it might sound, John Salvi and I want the same thing — avoidance of abortion and the security to bring children safely into this world.

Erin Barnes

In Divided We Fall: Gambling With History In The Nineties, author Haynes Johnson describes how those social factors that lead women to abortion are perpetuated. Johnson met with Sandra Burdick, head of the Maine Bureau of Income and Maintenance. She tells how in a year and a half, her agency experienced a 30 percent rise in food stamp beneficiaries and a 25 percent increase in AFDC requests, as while the welfare services were being cut. The situation was grim, but philosophically, Burdick supported then-Gov. John McKernan as he made budgetary and personnel cuts.

Her breaking point came when he proposed denying AFDC benefits to single women who have additional children. Burdick resigned, ending an 18-year public service career with the state. She explained how someone like her, whose only form of protest involved a few anti-war marches in the '60s, took the action she did:

"Ideologically and philosophically, I came to terms with the fact that even the poorest of the poor have to help solve this country's problems. I have always thought that I was trying to help people make their lives better. Some of them need our help to become what the rest of the world would deem 'productive members of society.'

"The Governor's policy said something different. This was a switch from trying to help people to blaming them for their situation, and, on top of that, punishing the children for the mistakes of their parents. This was a position I could not honor or defend."

Aid to Families with Dependant Children helps over 26 million people, yet it is less than 1 percent of the federal budget and 2 percent of the state budget. Twenty percent of children under 16 suffer from poverty.

If policy makers want to cut these social programs for reasons they believe are morally justified, why would a young woman faced with pregnancy choose to bring a child into this world, specifically when she knows in her heart that she cannot pay for it or guarantee its happiness?

Did John Salvi have these social issues in mind? Does he believe the child-rearing problems faced by young women could be eradicated by bullets? In all of my "altogether female" wisdom, I don't think there's enough ammunition in the world to do away with the social question of abortion.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

The protest in Piscataway, N.J., during the Massachusetts-Rutgers men's basketball game transcended the sport and should be seen for what it is — frustration. Students have received no help from anyone at Rutgers after their president, Francis Lawrence, made comments about minorities not having the genetic background to do well on college entrance exams.

Arthur Stapleton Jr.

There is no way that Lawrence should be permitted to remain the head of the university system, let alone stay as RU's president. Then again, I'm sure anytime Lawrence opens his mouth, it's large enough to fit both of his feet in.

Lawrence is another example of a person whose ignorance greatly overshadows his intelligence.

******

Even though the Minutemen weren't in Amherst, the scene at the Louis Brown Athletic Center resembled protests which very well could have happened on this campus.

Things probably would have been a little bit different, though, if the contest was played in the William D. Mullins Center. First of all, how could the woman who began the demonstration get out on the court while the Court Club contest was going on? Maybe they would have offered her a chance to make a layup, a foul shot, a three-pointer and a half-court bomb, all in 30 seconds, in order to win a GMC truck.

Nah, probably not. What if Massachusetts Coach John Calipari grabbed the public address microphone and begged the students to leave the court, allowing the game to continue? I can hear it now...

"Hey, people. You're the greatest fans. The classiest fans in America! Please get off the court. Get off the court. Please disperse! Please!"

The students would probably part like the Red Sea.

If the protest did continue, we wouldn't have the problem the Scarlet Knights had when attempting to contact their idiotic president. Our University President Michael K. Hooker is in the stands for every game, but what would the chancellor's role be in all of this?

Would he say the protest is part of the University's multicultural agenda? Would he set up a committee to solve the problem? How about offering the students a trip to Bertucci's? Or what about claiming he wasn't aware of the problems being protested...

******

Complaints have surfaced in the Basement over soda vending machines and their supply, or lack thereof, of Mountain Dew. It seems our favorite soft drink is frequently sold out in the Campus Center.

Well, rumor has it that massive consumption of Dew and Mello-Yello may result in sterility. If that's the case, one of two things can be said about the University. First, if the machines are not being filled regularly with cans of Dew, students frequently purchasing soda in the Campus Center have nothing to worry about.

However, If the masses at UMass are emptying the machines daily...

While we're on the topic, there seems to be some sort of underhanded University plot to get students to drink Nestea. One particular machine regularly dispenses the non- carbonated beverage whenever a selection is made. For example, you press Sprite, you get Nestea, you press Coke, you get Nestea, you press Mountain Dew, you get Nestea — you get the picture.

What is it with this stuff? Does it contain some sort of chemical that will make us all politically correct? Or does it just cure sterility? Drink up, baby.

******

Get online now. Feb. 13 is the date when the scholarship refund checks come in to the Bursar's Office in Whitmore. I wonder if higher-ups in the University are going to open the doors the night before so students could camp out in line, à la the wait for Final Rage in the Cage tix.

One other thing — put to work more than two tellers.

Arthur Stapleton Jr. is a Collegian columnist.

—Newt Gingrich
MEIN AMERICA
by Newt GINGRICH
Gulp...

Grunting and snarling at the world

I gotta lotta love in this heart.

I love many things in this world. I love my family and my friends. I love the Noxema girl, and I love the word phat. I love sports, and I love winning a game of Rummy. I love beautiful eyes, and I love chewing on sunflower seeds. I love laughing, and most of the time, I even love being laughed at. These are just some of the things I truly love.

However...

There are those things I cannot stand. Things that have irritated and annoyed me as of late.

I don't like the wind chill. I thought I was the only one who shouted and shadow-boxed with the wind, but I watched some girl grunting and snarling at it a couple of days back. And the library, the wind chill's sidekick? Grab a chisel and a friend and meet me at the ultimate phallic symbol. My idea of enjoyment is not spinning uncontrollably around the library as I'm taken by a gust of wind, my eyes streaming with tears and my cheeks turning a hideous purple color.

I don't like those pamphlets stuck underneath my door in the dorm. I live in the dorm, and I have to concern myself with a filing system for menus and safety notices.

I don't like when bus drivers wave to each other. I know I've mentioned this in the past, but it bugs the piss out of me. It is as automatic to the driver as putting a foot on the brake at a stop sign. And when the bus driver goes the extra length by smiling away? Stop it.

I don't like not being able to watch Letterman. Not only do I live in the dorm still, but my cable jack's messed up and I cannot watch my favorite late night show host. But I do get Jones and Jury, the infomercials, SCOLA and Conan. I'd love to know what I did to deserve this relentless agony.

I don't like how the tracking does not work on my VCR. It ruined one of the movies I was watching, I just can't tell you what movie it was.

I don't like how my Christopher Cross CD is scratched. There I am, turning on the beautiful soft voice of Christopher Cross before I go to sleep. Then, after the fourth song, the CD begins to skip. So the great song "Sailing" now sounds like a funky dance hit. I mean, hell, this is Christopher Cross, not Kriss Kross.

I don't like how Lionel Richie is showing me up by not putting out another album. Next one in early '94? Lionel, my man, I've been giving you lots of print over my column career. You're beginning to disappoint me. Back to Front is indeed a classic, but it's not as comforting as it used to be. If you're reading this out there, Lionel buddy, I haven't given up on you just yet. But I do have an interim favorite: James Ingram. Beautiful, beautiful voice.

I don't like the use of plows around here. One inch, and every plow this side of Mt. Tom is out doing their job. Six inches or more? Screw it, we'll wait 'till it melts in April.

Andrew Bryce

I don't like the Bursar's Office.

I don't like when the fifth floor bathroom is out of toilet paper. Almost as bad as seeing it after it has been spiked like it was two nights ago.

I don't like that "Teenie-Weenie" song: And no, not because of that. The woman's voice just pains me.

I don't like when people try to correct my R'Dylin (that's Rhode Island) accent. Where I come from, car is cah. Nothing against those r's, we just omit them on occasion for no particular reason.

I don't like WMUA radio air-play involving the overall music selection. Besides, I ain't into the polka thang.

I don't like the thought of all three of the trash cans in my dorm room are overflowing — and I live directly across from the trash room. So close that the fresh scent of garbage lingers through my room every now and then. But yet so far to actually get up and dispose my litter.

I don't like McDonald's workers. Let me tell you a story. My friends and I are treking home from West Virginia. We take a pit stop and I order. My extra value meal comes to $3.59, but all I have is a fin and 58 cents. I ask my buddy if he has any extra change and he says no. The McDonalds- worker-woman says to me, "Don't worry about it."

So, I give her the $5.58, figuring she'd give me the measly penny, since I "didn't have to worry about it," and give me the $2.

She gave me $1.99 in change.

Letters to the Editor

Minuteman fan speaks out

To the editor:

Jamie Asbedian, I sincerely hope you get to read this article. Being one that possesses such a big vocabulary and the ability to read and write words that have more than two or three syllables, you will have absolutely no difficulty in understanding this.

The first paragraph of your article, "Sharpshooting backcourt key for UConn," that was printed in the Tuesday edition of the Collegian was greatly insulting. If you had taken some time to do a little research like every other real writer, you might have come across the Minutemen grades for the fall semester. Just because they didn't do well in one semester in the middle of the basketball season doesn't make them and the rest of the school dummies.

If you actually went to college you might have realized how hard it is to combine studies with anything else. Next time try to stick to whatever topic you are writing on and don't try to fill up blank spaces with insults.

Sports fan shoots back

To the editor:

It was a tremendous feat at the start of the college basketball season for the No. 4 ranked UMass Minutemen to defeat the No. 1 defending national champion Arkansas Razorbacks. On that night UMass found, as George Washington would later, that No. 1 teams are far from untouchable. I know UMass is a great team. You know it too. But we all also know, even though it's hard to admit, that there's another team in the east called the UConn Huskies.

If anyone ever wanted to sound like a crybaby Art Stapleton Jr. succeeded in his article printed the day after UMass lost the No. 1 ranking and UConn assumed the No. 1 spot in the East. I'm not here to insult, just to educate and present some facts and to try and ease some tensions.

The Big East is one of the most difficult conferences across the country. The Atlantic 10, quite simply, is not. In the power rankings it comes in somewhere around eighth. UMass obviously outclasses the level of opponents there.

Instead of making up funny names like U-Scared why doesn't Stapleton question why UMass is staying put while teams like West Virginia are searching for bigger and better things in the Big East? Perhaps being the best in a weak league year after year and putting up banners in the Mullins Center gives UMass a sense of security. UMass fans are quick to call coach CAL-houn scared for not playing UMass, but perhaps they might be a little more respectful if they had to play powerhouses like Syracuse and Georgetown on a regular basis.

UMass played one of the toughest early schedules nationwide and did pretty well for themselves. Defeating Arkansas and Maryland and playing Kansas point for point are no easy tasks. However, when the level of opponent dropped so did UMass' intensity. Yes, UConn had early cakewalks over Lafayette and Yale but then went on to defeat a top 10 team in Duke. Sure the Blue Devils aren't playing up to par, but is Arkansas?

From there the Huskies beat a strong Illinois team, then ranked St. John's, Georgetown, Syracuse and Villanova (all ranked, then and now.) Not to mention the 25-point comeback, in conference, away from home, without senior co-captain Donny Marshal and under the hot lights of ESPN. That ought to erase any "No Camby at the GW game" excuses. Of course there was Kansas City, where the Huskies embarrassed themselves with no excuse but dismal play. But one bad game does not a season ruin.

UMass' run at no. 1, however lackluster, was still long and earned. However, jumping from a No. 4 position to the No. 1 spot is not unthinkable. Now UConn has made a huge 16-point leap to the No. 3 spot they hold now. And through it all, where is UMass? Oh yeah. They're back where they started, at a respectable No. 4. Only this time they have someone to look up to in the East. Who's better? Who knows? To be settled in Seattle...?

Incidentally, Mr. Stapleton Jr., your comment on UConn fans "sticking to women's basketball" confuses me. You act as if it's an insult to have the best women's team in the nation as well as a top 5 men's program. We will stick to our women's basketball program, the same we do with our men. It was really a moronic comment, but it doesn't matter anyway because I heard you throw like a girl.

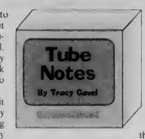
Simpson trial versus soap operas



First of all, let me take a moment to thank those faithful soap opera fans out there who have spared all of us the agonizing boredom of the O.J. Simpson trial. It's amazing what a few million angry phone calls can do to bring network executives to their knees and harmony to weekday afternoons.

Even Court TV enthusiasts must admit watching six hours a day would be pretty disruptive if not downright frustrating for devotees Oprah and "All My Children." If you ask me, it makes a lot more sense to run the trial in its entirety on a special channel for people who are interested, while the rest of us can see the really important stuff summarized on the news.

I guess I've become much more impatient with the whole process after seeing O.J. clad in his underwear last month during NBC's all-too-complete coverage of the proceedings. I just believe there are some matters only a jury should have to deal with, and crotch deliberations definitely fall into this category.

Prime time spotlight

On prime time, there have been plenty of specials and anniversary shows marking the beginning of February sweeps. Among the offerings have been NBC's "Mad About You," which featured singer Lyle Lovett in a nice little flashback episode

SPINNING THE BLACK CIRCLE

Just take those old records off the shelf because vinyl, once considered dead, is alive and well

BY MATT AUDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Reports of its death have been greatly exaggerated.

For the last decade the vinyl album has been considered a thing of the past by the music industry, stores and the general public, all willing to write it off as nothing more than quaint nostalgia.

But unknown to most, vinyl has been kept breathing by a small but rabid subculture which encompasses both collectors as well as the underground music scene: people who see it not just a format to listen to music, but the format to listen to music.

Beginning around the mid-'80s, sales of vinyl albums had steadily been plummeting. The popularity of the compact disc was slowly but surely overtaking that of the LP, and it seemed as though it was only a matter of time before music's original medium would finally be laid to rest.

The CD offered advantages the old, technologically outdated LP never could. Imagine: no annoying clicks and pops, no worrying over scratching or warping, and no dealing with the maintenance of needles and turntables. The CD allowed you to skip to any song you wanted to, pause it and fast-forward, all by remote control.

Introduced to a culture that thrives on convenience, it didn't take long for the CD to rise to the top of the retail graphs and push the vinyl album out of the record stores. By the time the '90s rolled in, the LP was pretty much considered as extinct, destined to take refuge in tiny mom and pop record stores, homes of old stalwarts who refused to roll with the times, and the dusty closets of those who just didn't care anymore.

Exhumed from a premature grave

Then, just recently, a funny thing happened. As the music world began to embrace such alternative heroes as Nirvana, Soundgarden and Sonic Youth, it slowly but surely began adopting to some of these band's ideologies — one of which was a strict appreciation for vinyl, a format that nurtured the groups when they were first starting out.

It didn't take long before many of these bands started executing some of the benefits of their newfound fame and started making it a practice to release their latest efforts one or even two weeks before the CD and cassette formats hit the stores. Done as a way of saying "thank you" to both the long-time fans who supported them when vinyl was the only format the band could afford and to the dying medium itself, many bands seemed to be trying to exhume the LP from what was thought to be a premature grave.

Unfortunately the outcome was predictable: hardcore fans scooped up the vinyl versions immediately while the rest of the general public patiently waited for the CD version to arrive. That was until Pearl Jam released its latest release, Vitalogy.

Seattle's favorite sons — in the spirit of undying musical integrity — released Vitalogy on vinyl a full two weeks before its release on both CD and cassette. And while this had come to seem like standard practice by now, the results were far from what was expected. Vitalogy went on to sell an estimated 35,000 copies on vinyl during the first two weeks of its release, proving two things. First, some fans just can't wait, and second, there is still a very viable market for the once thought dead and buried record album.

Vinyl just 0.2 percent of sales

"Pearl Jam and The Beatles [the recent Live at the BBC release] sold at least 30 copies in the first week. It was amazing," said Bex Zumbrusk, employee and independent music record buyer for Northampton's Main Street Records, one of the few area record stores that still carries and manages to move vinyl.

But Main Street Records has become a definite minority in the record store world. Aside from them and Dynamite Records, also in Northampton, very few stores actually carry new or used vinyl. But still there are those who will stop at nothing to get their hands on those vintage platters.

"There are people who come here specifically for vinyl," said David Heart, manager of Dynamite Records. "We have people who come from Albany and Vermont because they know we have it."

Although vinyl sales are nowhere near what they used to be (they make up only 0.9 percent of total sales), there is still a vast, somewhat underground division of the public who appreciates the so-called "truer" sound vinyl offers.

"When [vinyl] was moving 10 years ago it was 45 percent of sales — now it is 10 percent," Heart said. "There's still a market but it is not as substantial as it once was, not as substantial as we like. Yet there are people who still prefer it."

So what is it about vinyl that keeps some people coming back? Many argue it is more appealing because its somewhat large 12-by-12 size allows for bigger graphics and liner

"I don't have much of a part in Little Women. I'm the token penis."

People and Pop Culture in the News

It's a new year and you would think certain people would take the opportunity to reflect on the past and strive for a clear — if not cleaner — future. But for some, a clean slate isn't so easy to come by. Point in case: Kelley Deal, bassist for the Breeders, got busted for having heroin express mailed to her house and La Toya Jackson vows to marry convicted ex-boxer Mike Tyson before 1995. Always good to have something to strive for.

And speaking of striving, Tonya Harding is always looking up and out for her reputation. Woody Allen offered her a cameo in his latest film and she declined. Why? Well, apparently he has no morals (gasp).

Congrats to Heather Locklear and Richi Sambora for tying the knot; guess she just can't stay away from those bad boys of cheese rock. Also up to take a trip to the alter is fellow "Melrose Place" stars Grant Show and Laura Leighton.

Rap star Snoop Doggy Dog will be able to show his acting ability by debuting in the uncut version of Murder Was the Case. According to the rap master's publicist, the movie is a "gripping, uncensored 18-minute motion picture about life on the streets."

Interview With the Vampire co-stars Christian Slater and Brad Pitt both made the news — Slater because he tried to board a Delta Airlines flight with an unregistered handgun and Pitt topped Slater by putting his fist through a car windshield...by accident, of course, during the shooting of his next film, Seven.

Chevy Chase joins the blood brothers by being arrested for driving with a blood alcohol level double the legal limit. Guru of self-esteem and goddess of stopping the madness Susan Powers just declared Chapter 11. She will have good company with fellow pauper Kim Basinger, who reportedly spends $30,000 a year on beauty products. Clipping coupons sure must pay off.

Disney is in full gear, releasing a made-for-video sequel to The Lion King and another one to Aladdin. If the quality of animation is anything like The Return of Jafar, they need new animators.

And in the mist of O.J. Simpson madness is the Republic of Guyana(?!) Yes, the country published a commemorative stamp of the star in 1993. In Guyana they're worth $50; in America it's a whopping $9.95, plus shipping and handling.

And a parting question: Is this an Internet rumor or are Keanu Reeves and David Geffen really tying the knot?

Television — Voyager

"Will it flop? Won't it flop?" These questions plagued the newest "Star Trek" spinoff before it even had a cast. But Paramount took up the challenge and indeed that is what makes "Voyager" a sheer joy to watch.

In essence it takes the flavor and ideals of the original Trek series and gives it an added spin. The great thing about "Voyager" is the fact that 70 years away from Federation space is a long way — long enough to give Voyager a chance to do things "Star Trek: The Next Generation" and "Star Trek: Deep Space Nine" never had a chance to do.

This factor is nicely utilized with the introduction of two new aliens, Ocampa and Talaxian, who won't leave Trekkies running for their encyclopedias to find character flaws. And as for a female captain, the new comparison is now "Picard or Janeway?" signifying immediate interest and success.

Music — Drag City

In the spirit of independent music labels releasing compilations of their featured bands (Slumberland, Merge and Simple Machines Records have all recently put them out), Chicago-based Drag City Records has released Hey Drag City, a sampler of what the obscure but critically acclaimed label has to offer.

The compilation features such artists as Red Red Meat and Smog to such alternative favorites as Pavement and Royal Trux — both of whom started their careers at the label but have now moved on to greener pastures.

While none of the tracks featured on Hey Drag City will break any Top 40 records (though Pavement's tune is the most overly giddy thing they've done), it is a fine introduction to the label's sonically challenging but always rewarding output.

Show — John Trudell

Already being called "the event of the season," John Trudell and his Bad Dog Band will perform live at the Fine Arts Center on Feb. 28. One of the featured performers on Peter Gabriel's touring W.O.M.A.D. Festival, Trudell's reputation precedes him. Although the show is still two and a half weeks away, tickets went on sale Tuesday. Anyone interested should get down to FAC Box Office soon — demand is expected to be heavy.

John Trudell is not only a gifted singer/songwriter, he is also a poet, actor and immensely important political activist for Native American causes. He has appeared in the films Thunderheart and Incident at Ogala and spoken at dozens of colleges in the United States and Europe.

Copies of his latest album, Johnny Damas and Me, as well as a compilation of his poems, essays and speeches (Stickman) will be on sale at the FAC event.

Ross' film serves up more than expected

By Jon Lupo

BOYS ON THE SIDE
Directed by Herbert Ross
with Whoopi Goldberg, Mary-Louise Parker & Drew Barrymore

It's always a pleasure when a film surprises, and it's a double pleasure when a movie succeeds despite the most severe obstacles: yourself.

Boys on the Side was such an experience — a film I'd steeled myself against even before I'd seen it. I had my reasons, you see. First, director Herbert Ross has proven unfortunately adept at helming pathologically sentimental movies like Steel Magnolias. Second, he's working in a particularly sticky framework: the "woman's film," a much misunderstood genre that's as erratic as the term itself is sexist.

Yet Boys on the Side is different. Not in any sort of revolutionary way but in how it smoothly avoids many of the genre's pitfalls. It's a smart, well-acted and yes, moving soap opera. While delivering the soap and the opera in heaping measures, it manages to do it in a refreshingly understated way and that's the trick. It's hardly a feminist diatribe nor a treacly schmaltzfest. Think of it as the illegitimate, less-cerebral daughter of Thelma & Louise.

Though advertised as a road comedy, the film only starts out that way. Goldberg plays a lesbian rock singer who shares a ride to California with "the whitest woman alive," a meek real estate agent (Parker). They meet up with Goldberg's pregnant pal (Barrymore), who whacks her abusive, drug-dealing boyfriend over the head with a bat. They tie him up and flee, heading for nowhere.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS
Whoopi Goldberg

The trio settle down in Tucson, Ariz., after a medical emergency and a death for some serious female bonding. It's here where the film's true purpose takes shape — the jealousies, rivalries and unrequited loves, as well as the warmth, trust and honest emotion.

One of Boys' chief pleasures is in discovering the paths it takes. Some of them, like one character's AIDS illness, are predictable (and perhaps a bit too glibly manipulative), but others, like issues surrounding Goldberg's lesbianism, are more mutely detailed. Goldberg plays her flawed, which works better than a politically correct whitewash. And it's this diversion from the weepy norm that earns the film its sentiment — rather than having it inflicted upon the viewer.

What's also remarkable are the film's performances — all surprisingly first-rate. Parker, last seen undermining John Cusak's ego in Bullets Over Broadway, brings a sincere dignity to a role that screams righteous pathos (contrast Boys' wrenchingly understated final moments with the crass endings of say, Philadelphia or Steel Magnolias). With her role here, in Bullets and in last summer's The Client, Parker proves she's a multi-faceted character actress to be reckoned with.

Then there's Drew Barrymore, who for the first time delivers a detailed turn in a movie without a gratuitous sex scene and finally exceeds being just another pop-cultural anecdote. Barrymore's character, too, is flawed, and it's for this reason Boys transcends the tag as a film merely celebrating the eternal — and mythical — wonderfulness of womanhood while bashing men at every turn (Barrymore's character is complicitous in her abusive relationship without being wholly responsible).

It's also worth mentioning that Boys, despite its obvious feminine appeal, was both written and directed by men. It's a footnote to be sure, but an interesting one. In this film, the boys — and the girls — are all on the same side. Lower your guard and you just might enjoy it. B+

Premiere highlights show by Pioneer Valley dancers

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Correspondent

The Valley Dances will premiere a music/dance event tomorrow night as part of the Northampton Arts Council's winter series, Four Sundays in February.

"If the Shoes Fit," a celebration of the vitality of the Valley's dance community, is choreographed by Katherine Sanderson of Northampton's Dance Gallery.

The four-suite dance performance is sponsored by the council and the Smith College dance department.

Both tomorrow night's performance and a Sunday matinee will take place at Northampton's Academy of Music.

Pianist Tom McClung wrote the music specially for Sanderson's dance. He is joined by percussionists Adé Bayo, Ian Malik, Charles Miller and Jon Weeks on woodwinds and percussion and Herman Hampton on bass and percussion.

Also lending a hand in the creation of "If the Shoes Fit" is choreographer Dorothy Jungles of the Everett Dance Theater of Providence, R.I. Jungles conducted workshops and met with the dancers in December and then came to the Valley for a week in January to serve as consultant on the dance piece.

Jungles teaches at Rhode Island College and is the recipient of a

Hampshire College to present winter concert

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

With the Canadian Express blessing the Five College area recently, the frightful weather leaves "tiptoeing through the tulips" the last thing on any sane person's mind. Coming out of the cold is pretty much the only thing on everyone's mind, no matter what you like or where you come from.

At 8 p.m. today through Saturday at the Studio Theater, Music and Dance Building on the campus of Hampshire College, original student compositions will be exhibited at the annual Winter Dance Concert. If improvisational dance performed by students from our own Five College area warms your heart and appeals to your artistic senses, this will be the place to see it.

"The key to this concert is the original choreography," said Rebecca Nordstrom, associate professor of dance at Hampshire and artistic coordinator of the evening's programs.

"If anyone is interested in seeing what students around this area are creating, this would be the one to see," she said.

Four dancers will open the hour-long show with a live improvisation to the accompaniment of pianist John Sprague.

After this the styles of solo, duet and trio choreography will be represented by Jane Ierardi, Pele Bauch, Liza Neal and Nichole Canuso, with a classical Indian solo in the Bharata Natyun style performed by Sejal Patel.

The four Hampshire College student composers will show a myriad of influences. Ierardi will perform a solo modern piece and Neal's thoughts and images of Mary Magdalene will be the emphasis for her choreography for the duet.

The trend of using smaller groupings will continue with Canusco and Bauch, each using the trio format — one for a piece named "Insomnia," and the other dancing to the music of Philip Glass.

Incorporated into these pieces will be dancers from the Five Colleges, so the Hampshire Dance Studio Theater will be filled with the artistic talents of the entire area. Altogether, it's a fine atmosphere for both the student composers and the audience who will be assuredly coming out of the cold.

"It will be a very charming, chamber-style concert," Nordstrom said, "different from the others in the past years with this unique chamber feel, fairly intimate works for an intimate setting.

"Each concert is different, but this year's program is special because it is centered around these small groupings. It will be a nice representation of the work our students are doing."

The annual Winter Dance Concerts will begin at 8 p.m. tonight, Friday and Saturday in Hampshire College's Dance Studio Theater. Tickets are $3 each. Reservations are recommended and can be made by calling 582-5675. For further information call Rebecca Nordstrom at 582-5546, or Jean Baxter at 584-7097.

■ VINYL

notes. Others will swear up and down it just sounds better — and more authentic — than any CD ever could.

"We are living in the darkest age of musical sound. Digital is completely wrong. It's a farce," wrote rock n' roll legend and vocal vinyl supporter Neil Young in Harper's magazine.

Young, like many other musicians, stands by vinyl and even goes as far as spending extra time making sure the LP versions of his albums are done with particular care.

'Warmer' sound

But don't write off vinyl appreciation as just for dinosaur musicians nostalgic for days gone by. Many vinyl aficionados will swear on their collections that the pluses of the LP far outweigh the minuses.

The sound of vinyl is warmer to me," said area musician Ray Mason, who estimates he has around 7,000 45s and around 4,000 to 5,000 LPs. "I like taking it out of the sleeve — it seems more personal to me."

And that claim that it sounds "warmer" is one heard repeated often by most vinyl fans. So many music lovers and musicians say the music on vinyl is superior in sound that one almost has to begin to wonder if there is any truth to the claim.

According to a study published in New Scientist magazine, there is. The study showed the average music listener can barely tell the difference between the sound of the record and that of the CD.

Still, many would argue records depreciate too quickly, falling victim to scratches and warping. But to the vinyl lover, that is just one aspect of its charm.

"I like the scratches," Mason said. "That just becomes part of the sound."

Street credibility, novelty charm

Many people seem to agree, since vinyl has not only become a favorite for those who remember its heyday, but also to a whole new generation. Vinyl has, surprisingly, been the format of choice for hip indie labels all across the music world for quite some time. Thanks to its street credibility and novelty charm, vinyl has transcended its former antique status and taken on a whole new life.

"Basically, even if you sell a lot you might only make your money back. They're a labor of love," said Mal Thursday, owner of Chunk Records, an area independent record label that puts most of its releases out on vinyl.

"Vinyl is much cooler," he said. "I will always try to get things out on vinyl, because it is my favorite.

This underdog-type love is what seems to keep the vinyl aesthetic alive and well. This love — and the fact that it is cheaper for a band or label to press 7-inch singles (more commonly known as a 45) than it is for them to press CDs — makes vinyl an affordable and lucrative way to get new music out to the public.

People can't afford $15 dollars on a CD just to try out a new band," said Main Street's Zuntzunuk. "So they buy a single instead since it only costs around $3."

So far the 7-inch single seems to be the most popular format among indie-rock enthusiasts. Since prices of singles tend to be more economical, there is also the bonus incentive of tracks that are not available anywhere else, limited edition printing and colored wax to give it added charm.

"With colored wax [vinyl] has that child like appeal with that piece of Crayola colored vinyl sticking out of the sleeve," Thursday said. "And he may be right, since independent record labels have been pressing more and more of their singles in brilliant greens, blues and reds.

Of course this may all just be nothing more than a trend that will come and pass, but undoubtedly there is still a sub- culture interested keeping the vinyl format alive.

Turntables sales rose a startling 38 percent in 1993 and more and more record stores across the country are bringing vinyl sections back into their stores. A whole new generation that missed vinyl's popularity the first time around are buying into its retro-mystique. They enjoy its novelty and its charm, and they are helping keep its somewhat flickering spirit alive.

depicting the wedding of Paul and Jamie. On the same network, "Seinfeld" celebrated its 100th episode with some pretty funny clips from old shows.

Over on Fox, "Married...With Children" reached its 200th with the unflappable George Plimpton offering his usual deadpan commentary. I used to love this sitcom, but lately Al and the gang have gotten too bitter even for me.

I really don't like the way Amanda Bearse's character has been transformed from a materialistic working woman into a demonized feminist ball-buster. Al Bundy's arch enemy shouldn't be the next-door neighbor; it should be himself and his own insurmountable idiocies. I mean, I know the show's humor is derived from a lot of men versus women type situations, but maybe I've just lost my taste for these jokes.

Speaking of antagonism between the sexes, ABC broadcast a pretty compelling (if not quite convincing) report by "20/20" correspondent John Stossel called "Boys and Girls are Different: Men, Women and the Sex Difference." The show argued guys are naturally inclined to do manly things like firefighting and balancing chemistry equations, while gals are doomed to spend their days running around nurturing everything in sight.

While I still don't put much stock in biological predestination, this program opened me up to the possibility that genetic mutations in both genders might explain why "Sisters" and "Walker, Texas Ranger" are still attracting viewers. Hey, you never know.

Made for TV

I just realized I forgot to mention Fox's highest-rated celebrity exploitation flick to date, The O.J. Simpson Story. Best to keep it forgotten, I think.

To conclude on a cheery note, I've saved the best show of the week for last. NBC's absorbing Serving in Silence: The Margarethe Cammermeyer Story was a made-for-TV movie about the real life dismissal of a high-ranking army officer after she revealed her homosexuality.

Unlike Philadelphia (a movie that wanted to tell the story of a gay man but ended up telling the story of a gay man's lawyer), Serving in Silence delves into the lives of its characters in a straightforward and unapologetic manner. I especially liked the filmmakers' efforts kept the obligatory court room antics at arm's length while focusing on the particulars of Cammermeyer's life — especially her interactions with family members and the ways in which her coming out and filing suit against the army affected those relationships.

Glenn Close was tough and gutsy in the title role, which is certain to win her a deserved Emmy nomination. Judy Davis was effective too, as Close's girlfriend — I just wish the makeup artists hadn't made her look quite so much like Mick Jagger. Good thing the director saved their sexy, on-screen kiss until the final shot, otherwise viewers would have seen gobs of Davis' lipstick all over everything.

I must say I have newfound respect for Barbara Streisand, who co-produced the film. She inpressed me so much I can almost forgive her for making The Prince of Tides. Well, almost.

choreographer's fellowship from the Rhode Island State Council on the Arts. She has also received two Choreographer's Fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts.

In addition to her contribution as a consultant for the dance, Jungles wil bring her own dance company to perform in the Valley Dances.

The Everett Dance Theater will premiere their new work, "Roll," choreographed by company member Walter Ferrero. This piece is unique in that it will be performed on Rollerblades. They will also perform excerpts from their repertory, "The Science Project" and the "Pandora Restaurant."

Among the area dancers participating in the Valley Dances are Billbob Brown of the University of Massachusetts Dance Department and Susan Waltner of the Smith's dance department.

The Valley Dances will be performed at the Academy of Music in Northampton tomorrow at 8 p.m. and on Feb. 12 at 2 p.m. Tickets for the Valley Dances are $10 and can be purchased in advance at State St. Fruit Store and Guild Art Center in Northampton and at For the Record in Amherst.

Higher Learning album disappoints

HIGHER LEARNING SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
550 Music/Epic Soundtrax

One would think gathering a varied element of today's cutting edge musicians and putting them on a soundtrack would become the end-all, be-all of movie compilations.

But not unlike the movie, the Higher Learning Soundtrack has enormous potential but becomes just an overview of the different styles of music presented.

A few standout tracks do exist in this sea of the mundane. Liz Phair utilizes a very simple melody with success on "Didn't Have Time." OurKast score by traveling down the minimalist road, utilizing very few samples with a focus on the rapping with "Phobia." Finally, veteran funk/jazz fusion bassman Stanley Clark delivers the best groove on the entire album with "The Learning Curve," an instrumental. Unfortunately, the listener has to wait until the end of the album to hear it.

Other than these standouts, the rest of the music could be a response if each musician was asked to sum up their style in song. "Higher" by Ice Cube is basically the same groove as in his collaboration with Dr. Dre ("Natural Born Killaz"), just slowed down a bit. Me'Shell NdegeOcello, Mista Grimm, Raphael Saadiq (of Tony! Toni! Tone!), and Zhane all deliver faceless slow jams, totally devoid of any originality.

These might be excusable if the songs in between had redeeming value — but they don't. In the "some things are better left alone" department, Tori Amos absolutely butchers R.E.M.'s "Losing My Religion" by omitting some lyrics and repeating others at her own discretion — and still manages to stretch it to an excruciating five minutes in length. Her other contribution isn't much better; "Butterfly" lacks any of the musical flow and lyrical cohesion so evident on her earlier albums.

If you've heard Rage Against The Machine, you've heard "Year Of The Boomerang," which basically sums up everything they are (musically and lyrically), but it isn't anything but a parody of the band itself.

While on the subject of parodies, tracks two and eight are attempts to follow in the footsteps of Quentin Tarantino by inserting dialogue from the movie. The problem is obvious here, as the dialogue just doesn't have the catch phrases and style Reservoir Dogs and Pulp Fiction had, and with only two of them, it seems like an afterthought of a mistake that wasn't caught in time.

Other forgettable tracks include the plodding "Eye" from Eve's Plum and an ultimately boring jam by The Brand New Heavies on "Higher Learning/Time For Change." After listening to this album, you'll know it's time for change as well. Or in this case, time to change...your CD that is. D

Manson to bring shock rock chaos

By Wayken Shaw
Collegian Correspondent

Halloween is coming a little earlier this year — tomorrow, to be exact. For those fortunate enough to catch Marilyn Manson at Pearl Street, this isn't going to be any traditional holiday, nor a pleasant one.

The newest in a long line of "shock rockers," Marilyn Manson are ready to set the world on fire with a live show that mixes subculture theatrics with their angst-ridden, industrial grind. Considering past perfurmances have included such controversial props as crucified naked women, raw meat and a bloodied Ronald McDonald, one can only imagine what the future holds.

And if their latest album, Portrait of an American Family, is any indication of what's in store tomorrow night, then expect as much horror and graphic sickness as a Stephen King novel.

Formed in 1990, this five-piece band from south Florida isn't entirely about negative energy. In fact, they're about exposing the duality of nature, albeit from a negative point of view. The band's

Candle co. hosts chocolate extravaganza

By Steve Costello
Collegian Correspondent

There are few better ways to spend a winter day than enjoying chocolate and having fun. This weekend the Yankee Candle Company will tempt chocoholics by hosting the second annual Chocolate Lovers Festival on Feb. 11 and 12 from noon to 5 p.m.

Last year the event attracted many visitors to Northampton from the Boston area as well as from out of state. The Hotel Northampton housed 18 vendors who indulged a crowd of 2,000 people with tantalizing treats.

Area restaurants, cooking schools, candy makers and all sorts of chocolate producers plan to participate in this year's event at the candlemaker's South Deerfield location.

"Henion Bakery of Amherst, Holyoke Community College, The Pampered Chef, Java House and the Charlemont Inn are just five of the participators," said Philip Keenan, a chef from Holyoke Community College.

The event will host 50 vendors and include a demonstration area, plus many seating areas and live entertainment. Keenan and Abbe Franklin from the Franklin County Technical School will be some of the chefs putting on live demonstrations.

Performances by Andy Jaffe, The Mohawk Jazz Band from Mohawk Trail Regional High School and the Williams College Jazz Ensemble are scheduled.

Vendors will offer mini portions priced from 50 cents to $5 and boxed goodies to be taken home. Free shopping bags will be provided by the Yankee Candle Company to gather all the accumulated goodies.

Area chefs from the New England Culinary Institute, Franklin County Technical School and Holyoke Community College's Culinary arts program will provide demonstrations and cooking instructions pertaining to chocolate. Chocolate sculptures, centerpieces and other decorations will also be displayed.

Since the weekend immediately precedes Valentine's Day, the festival will have an intimate feel and atmosphere created by romantic lighting, candles, floral arrangements and wait staff dressed in their black and whites.

The Yankee Candle Company is located on Route 116, South Deerfield, and is on the PVTA bus line. Many New England bus companies in conjunction with local hotels and B&Bs are offering weekend packages to bring in guests from around the region. For more information, call 539-5552 or 665-8858.

■ Manson

moniker, for instance, comes from Marilyn Monroe and Charles Manson and the respective dark and light sides of their personality. On the other hand, the androgynous nature of the name reflects the idea that gender makes little difference.

Lead singer Mr. Manson put it best when he said, "I don't worry about sexism, racism or any 'ism, because I hate people on an individual basis."

This sort of twisted, cynical diplomacy has taken the band a long way, considering Marilyn Manson started as a non - musical concept. Marilyn Manson is essentially a character created by Mr. Manson in an effort to buck the system and offer both ends of the spectrum.

"It was a name that signified everything I wanted to stand for. It was androgynous, positive and negative, it was love, it was hate," he said.

Things started to evolve musically when Manson met guitarist Daisy Berkowitz and found a kindred spirit in what Berkowitz had to offer. The band was subsequently rounded out by Twiggy Ramirez (bass), Madonna Wayne Gacy (organ/samples), and Sara Lee Lucas (drums).

Since then, the band has been riding high on critical acclaim for Portrait while earning public praise from their stint opening for Nine Inch Nails.

Now with a headlining tour of their own in more intimate venues across the United States and Canada, Marilyn Manson will get a chance to stand on their own and give the public an up close and personal experience of the utter chaos they create.

Marilyn Manson with opening act Monster Voodoo Machine will perform tomorrow at Pearl Street in Northampton. Showtime is 8:30 p.m. and admission is 18+. Tickets cost $7 in advance and are available at Tix Unlimited and For The Record in Amherst. For more information, call 584-7771.

'Scam' proves to be legitimate

Reports of a scam that surfaced in Coolidge Residence Hall over the past week have turned out to be a false alarm.

According to a woman who wished to remain anonymous, a man was soliciting coupons in Coolidge for $25 for Palace Beach Salon in Holyoke.

She said the man was roughly 6 feet tall, dressed "preppie" and looked like an average college student. He walked into the room and pressured the women present to buy the coupons, and was unclear as to the location of the salon.

Resident assistants were notified that the man was asking specifically where women's rooms were, and were told to notify authorities if he was seen again.

Another woman said she and several others bought the coupon and were informed later by their resident assistant that the coupons were a scam. A description of the man selling the coupons was reported to the police.

A call placed to the Palace Beach Salon proved the coupons to be real.

Speaker: fetal rights infringe on women's equality

By Laura Schmidt
Collegian Staff

Do the costs of fetal rights infringe upon women's equality? A Yale University graduate student says they do.

On Tuesday evening at Mount Holyoke College, Rachel Roth gave a presentation entitled At Women's Expense: The Costs of Fetal Rights.

Roth, a graduate student of political science at Yale, presented part of her dissertation research which analyzes fetal rights politics in the United States from 1973 to 1992.

"I believe that fetal rights are created at the women's expense, and that women pay dearly for them," Roth said.

"Fetal rights present a rhetorically powerful strategy by giving the fetus an individual identity, asserting its equality with the woman and establishing its independent relationship with the state that bypasses the pregnant woman."

In her analysis, Roth said the question of the cost of fetal rights is important.

"When a court or other institution decides to give fetuses rights, it has to assign the cost of those rights to some individual," she said.

Roth said she believes the explicit or imposed answer has been to impose the cost of fetal rights on women.

During the 1970s and '80s many industries, such as Johnson Control, excluded all fertile women from the workplace, said Roth.

She said such environments were considered dangerous to fetal development, which jeopardized women's access to some 20 million jobs.

"Women often times lose money and opportunities when fetal protection policies exclude them from jobs," Roth said.

According to Roth, men were not excluded from these jobs due to the cost risk of closing the factories, even though chemicals such as lead proved to be harmful for their children and lowered sperm counts.

In 1991, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against such a policy excluding women from jobs.

"This would single out some workers on the basis of their ability to conceive," said Roth.

"This clearly violates the Pregnancy Discrimination Act."

In addition to addressing fetal rights policies in the workplace, she discussed fetal rights conflicts and policies in the court room.

Roth said it is often is the courts and judges, not the women, who make wrong decisions.

She said this was apparent in the case of Angela Carter, where the court ruled she had to undergo a Caesarean section in order to save the life of her fetus. Carter and her fetus both died shortly after surgery.

"Fetal rights politics sometimes force surgery upon women that neither they nor their fetus need," Roth said. "Women must bear the cost of everyone else's mistakes."

and the report has been good: 2.82 GAA (tied-6th in NCAA Division I), .906 save percentage (1st-Division I).

The West is territory known to be free-spirited and experimental: it's not just Winnipeg which has embraced that philosophy in goaltending maneuvers. Sure, the Jets must keep their fingers crossed nightly with either Tim Cheveldae (who's more Edsel than Chevy) or hurried rookie Nikolai Khabibulin, but the Los Angeles Kings have already used four goaltenders: Kelly Hrudey and Robb Stauber and two rookies, Jamie Storr and Pauli Jaks.

Storr is a keeper, the seventh pick overall in last year's draft, but when both Hrudey and Stauber got hurt, Jaks entered the fray. He hadn't gotten as much work in Phoenix of the IHL, who has borrowed and benefitted from Byron Dafoe's (Washington) play.

Speaking of the Capitals, they're in position to adjust their net situation as well. After senselessly peddling Don "The Shutout" Beaupre to Ottawa for a fifth round pick — not that Beaupre's great, but Ottawa will have to steal someone that late in the draft — Rick Tabaracci has been ineffectively thrust into the No. 1 role. Tabs was considered one of the league's top backups, but the increased time has only increased his goals against average. Dafoe is a candidate for promotion, but don't forget Weymouth's Jim Carey, yet another Catholic Memorial grad who has really impressed Portland, the Capitals' AHL affiliate.

"[Carey]'s doing really well, and he's making a lot of money, I know that," UMass checking forward and former CM teammate Keith O'Connell said. "If there's one kid that can [earn promotion to the NHL] I think it's him because he plays with a lot of poise, he's a big kid, and he's got a lot of experience in college (Wisconsin) and internationally (World Junior Championships)."

Should Carey come up, he'll join what already must be viewed as one of the deepest rookie crops in years. Between Storr, Blaine Lacher, Paul Kariya, Peter Forsberg, Todd Harvey, Jason Allison and Jeff Friesen, fans are looking at an exciting NHL future. Not seeing what these guys bring to the table would have been one of the worst results of a cancelled season.

Will they erect a statue of Beaupre outside the Ottawa Civic Center?

The Bruins already have one Calder Trophy candidate in Lacher, and they drafted Evgeny Ryabchikov with their first pick last year (21st overall), but Scott Bailey might be next in line for the backup job in Boston. Bailey, now with Providence, is fourth in GAA in the AHL (2.69) behind Dunham (2.54), Schwab (2.55) and Carey (2.60), but Ryabchikov's been porous (.863).

Think you know which undrafted Hockey East player is projected highest by the Central Scouting Bureau for the 1995 Entry Draft? Doubt it. It's not UMass–Lowell's Greg Bullock or Maine's Blair Allison; it's Merrimack's freshman left wing Gaetan Poirier, rated 73rd by CSB.

Now that Mike Keenan has the Blues on the road to Cup contention, it's time for Craig Janney to pack his bags. The talented but fragile center may be homeward bound in a deal for Hartford grinder Pat Verbeek. Janney's been benched in the Blues' last two games, but with the Rams coming to town, a new arena (Kiel Center), an exciting college hoops bunch and a colorful hockey team (even more colorful with the new uniforms), St. Louis is as lively as ever.

Rotisserie league gems: Adam Creighton, Stephane Fiset, Brent Gilchrist, Joe Murphy, German Titov.

After a flash-in-the-pan season of 1992-93 (104 points) preceded by years of mediocrity, last year the Nordiques slid again (76 points). That put Joe Sakic on the trading block, but he ignored the rumors and continued to produce. He leads the NHL in scoring (4-11-15) as Quebec has soared to the top of the Atlantic Division standings.

Both George Washington coach Mike Jarvis and University of Maryland coach Gary Williams serve on the advisory board of the foundation.

In the foundation's mission statement released yesterday, the group points to how the tournament will help it reach its fund-raising objective of $500,000:

"There is an acute need to raise money for disadvantaged and at-risk children of the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area...The Children's Charities Foundation, which will raise most of its funds from an annual basketball tournament, will fund non-profit organizations that support disadvantaged and at-risk children by assisting educational and recreational programs."

Material from the Associated Press was used in this article.

■ Regan

the biggest reason why I chose this program was to be in on a program from the beginning. I think UMass has a great future and I'd love to be one of the kids to establish it."

"We talked a lot about him going to UMass, and he accepted and understood their situation," Earl said.

Regan has just two superstitions: he eats the same pre- game meal — a bacon double cheeseburger, medium fries and a Coke (courtesy of McDonald's), and he taps the goalposts the same way before each game. A far cry from the oddities expressed by his favorite athlete, Montreal goaltending great Patrick Roy, infamous for conversing with his goalposts.

"I don't like talking to myself because it gets me thinking too much," Regan said.

That's fine; Regan may save his thoughts for Shakespeare.

Tix lottery for A–10s

New system in place to avoid chaos

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

If.

There is a chance that the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will host the Atlantic 10 Tournament championship game for the fourth consecutive season. And if — definitely the key word — the title game is played at the William D. Mullins Center, there is a way for students to get tickets a month ahead.

All tickets will be handed out randomly and students must apply for tickets by 5 p.m. on Feb. 10 at the Curry Hicks Cage. Applications are also being printed in each issue of the Daily Collegian through Friday. These applications should be brought to the Cage.

As for the price, tickets are $5 each and all seats are reserved. Students can apply for two tickets, and can only submit one application form. Students who turn in more than one will be automatically disqualified.

All winners and non-winners will be notified by mail. If UMass does not host the championship, all applications will be returned.

Thorr Bjorn, assistant athletic director of Game Operations/Tickets, says the new system has to do with maintaining "pure safety" as well as being a "one-step process." There will be no line forming in the wee hours of the morning, thus avoiding any problems arising from the mob of ticket-wishers they have had in the past.

Bjorn sees this system as the best possible one.

"We have seen some problems in the past and have tried to improve each year to avoid these problems. We're doing our best to provide a service for the students. We just want everyone to have an equal opportunity," Bjorn said.

As of 2:30 p.m. Monday afternoon, 500 applications were turned in.

Briefs: No progress for baseball

WASHINGTON (AP) — They couldn't save the World Series last fall. Mediator W.J. Usery couldn't get them to work out a deal over the winter. Even President Clinton couldn't make them budge with spring training a week and a day away.

After all the words, all the lobbying, the loads of litigation and reams of proposed legislation, baseball players and owners likely will have to settle the baseball strike themselves. On this, the 180th day of the strike, the sides are nearly as far apart as they were on Jan. 15, 1995, when talks on a new collective bargaining agreement began.

For the next few days, whether House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole agree with President Clinton's call for binding arbitration will be more important than whether acting commissioner Bud Selig can agree with union head Donald Fehr.

The Constitution of the United States gives Clinton enormous power, but there's no "best interest of baseball clause." Even after they were summoned to the White House, players and owners couldn't agree on anything.

- Owners offered to accept the plan issued by Usery; players declined.
- Players offered to send the dispute to binding arbitration; owners refused.
- Players offered to play under the old rules while a presidential fact-finding panel investigated. Owners refused.

"We've worked hard for more than three hours now, and we could not agree on a process that both sides thought was fair to their interest, which would immediately permit me to announce that baseball would be played this season," Clinton said.

"But we did have some new ideas offered that had not been on the table before that I thought would lead to that. Unfortunately, it did not — at least it has not tonight."

Outsiders who often wonder why baseball is so bitter don't realize it's one of the most closed societies in the country, refusing to even listen to anyone who's not a "baseball person," Just ask Peter Ueberroth. Or Fay Vincent. Or Richard Ravitch. Or Usery. Or Clinton.

In the short time it took to walk the five blocks from the White House back to the Mayflower Hotel after Clinton's news conference, players and owners began flashing fighting words again.

Union officials, already livid about Usery's suggestions for a settlement, were enraged that it became public. Fehr accused owners of leaking it.

The mediator's plan would give the owners much of what they want. He suggested a 50 percent luxury tax. Players commanding $5 million-a-year salaries would cost high-payroll clubs a total of $7.5 million a season. A $25 million, five-year deal would cost those teams $37.5 million, more per year than Barry Bonds' contract with the San Francisco Giants.

Owners vow to lobby hard on Capitol Hill to fight Clinton's legislation for binding arbitration.

Players vow to lobby equally hard for it.

Two things seem likely at this point: Spring training will start a week from Thursday with replacement players. And the fight will continue unabated.

Poll says Mass. residents are against funding Patriots

BOSTON (AP) — Most Massachusetts fans want the New England Patriots to stay in the state, but few want to spend public money to renovate Foxboro Stadium, or build a new arena.

But the poll of 400 persons taken this week for The Boston Globe showed that 57 percent approved of the state paying for roadway improvements to the stadium.

Patriots owner Robert Kraft is asking for $35 million in road improvements, and $50 million in loan guarantees or state-backed financing to upgrade the stadium. He has hinted that without state help, he may relocate the team.

"The public wants the Patriots to stay, but they are just not willing to pay for a new stadium or a stadium upgrade," said Gerry Chervinsky of KRC Communications Research in Newton. "They clearly view that as Bob Kraft's responsibility."

On Gov. William Weld's desire to build a megaplex that includes a football stadium and convention center, only 33 percent were in favor; 31 percent said the state shouldn't build either, and 28 percent favored only a convention center.

The message is clear, said Chervinsky.

"The majority says build a convention center but don't spend state money on a football facility," he said.

And given the choice between spending $50 million to improve Foxboro or $200 million for a Boston football stadium, 36 percent rejected either choice; 30 percent favored stadium improvements and 28 percent favored a new stadium.

The poll has a 5 percent margin of error.

Celts activate Strong

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Celtics activated forward Derek Strong from the injured list on Wednesday and placed guard Jay Humphries on it.

Humphries, acquired last Friday from Utah in a trade for Blue Edwards, has a sore right knee. He had been on Utah's injured list since Jan. 20 and has missed 29 games with the injury.

Strong went on the Celtics injured list the same day with a bruised left shoulder. He is averaging 6 points and 5.3 rebounds in 36 games.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Creativity flows today, but so does your temper. Pay it cool, keep your irritation under wraps. Certain co-workers may annoy you, protect your turf and contacts.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Do not be afraid to take the lead. Others are counting on you. An optimistic attitude holds favor with high-ups looking for people to promote. Communication helps you meet an important deadline.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your managerial talents get a real workout now. Be cautious when dealing with office gossips. The road ahead seems clear, but the pitfalls are many. Be more sensitive.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do not choose the easy way out. Diligence on the work front will lead to eventual success. Be aggressive when promoting pet projects. A loved one asks for a special favor.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Flexibility counts today when dealing with influential people. Tend to essential tasks before launching a new project. Write concise memos that everyone can understand.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A take-charge attitude may work wonders on the job, but not at home. Higher-ups are open to creative ideas. Rid your mind of negative thoughts. Refuse to talk for a solo story.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Turn away from selfish concerns and help the disadvantaged. Volunteering at a community center will show you what a really important job is.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Keep your nose to the grindstone. Employer will be impressed by your dedication to duty. A corsage industry could suddenly take off; check it out. Romance becomes a source of real delight. Be affectionate.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Proceed with caution on all fronts. Your instincts are good, but circumstances may be less than ideal. Avoid an aggressive newcomer who covets your resources and contacts. Rely on tried-and-true allies.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Give self-doubts the heave-ho and concentrate on work you can handle alone. Secret deals could boomerang, keep everything strictly above-board. A shopping spree could deplete your budget. Look for inexpensive ways to update your wardrobe.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Wait until you get the green light before launching a large-scale business venture. Stop kidding yourself about your spending. Put those credit cards under lock and key. An outdated buying person needs guidance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Turn away from anyone who tries to bait you. Channeling your energies into constructive pursuits will boost your confidence. An older person offers good advice. Be candid with loved ones. Low public transportation whenever possible.

Rutgers game to be played March 2 at Palestra

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

After what could be the longest halftime in Atlantic 10 history, Massachusetts and Rutgers will meet again March 2 to play the second half of the game they started Tuesday night, but in a different place.

The Minutemen and Scarlet Knights will arrive early for the Atlantic 10 Tournament in order to finish their game. The Palestra in Philadelphia, the site of the A-10 Championships, has agreed to host the final half of the contest two days before the tournament is scheduled to begin.

Atlantic 10 Commissioner Linda Bruno said both Rutgers and Massachusetts were eager to complete the game.

"Both athletic directors and coaches made it clear that they wanted this game resumed and every effort was made to find a date that would accommodate both teams," Bruno said yesterday.

"The Palestra was chosen to accommodate the travel plans of both teams as they travel to the Atlantic 10 Championship, which will begin two days later at the Palestra."

The game was suspended when a Black female student walked onto the court at Rutgers' Louis Brown Arena and sat down at center court just prior to the start of the second half. Shortly after a crowd of over 150 people, mostly students, joined her in a sit-in protest of what has been considered racially insensitive comments made by Rutgers President Francis Lawrence.

Both teams were asked to leave the floor and after 24 minutes of negotiations between Rutgers University officials and members of the local law enforcement, Bruno ordered the game suspended, citing safety reasons.

The Minutemen will return to action this Saturday when they travel south to take on the Southwestern Louisiana Ragin' Cajuns in the return game for the "Final Rage in the Cage" two seasons ago.

Massachusetts to compete in Franklin Classic

The University of Massachusetts will participate in its second prestigious early December tournament in as many years next year, when they compete in the Franklin National Bank Classic.

The tournament will take place Dec. 2-3 in Landover, Md. In addition to Massachusetts, A-10 rival George Washington, Maryland and Florida will also participate.

Massachusetts, to balance its conference schedule, will likely play the Colonials in the first round of the tournament. The second game could feature a continuation of the growing rivalry between the Minutemen and the Terrapins.

Proceeds from the tournament will be given to the recently established Children's Charities Foundation.

Rotating goalies, talented rookies highlights in NHL

Ottawa 3, Philadelphia 0. Hell hath frozen over.

Wasn't it odd that the Vancouver Canucks pulled goaltender Kirk McLean despite trailing the Chicago Blackhawks by five goals? Oh, my mistake, McLean was in net, you just couldn't tell. Perhaps it would have been wiser for Rick Ley to relieve McLean; an empty net has a better chance of making a save.

Congrats to 1994 Canadian Olympic center Dwayne Norris, brother of UMass' Warren, for getting a well- deserved recall from the Quebec Nordiques. Norris was tearing up the AHL with the Cornwall Aces (24 goals, 38 assists, 62 points in 47 games), Quebec's farm league squad. Norris makes the New England tour this week, as the Nords stopped in Hartford (with Warren in attendance) last night and head into Boston tonight for a game I'll be attending.

Ted Kottler on the NHL

"He's worked hard all these years and he's a top three scorer in the AHL," Warren said. "I didn't think he was getting a fair shake, so I'm pretty happy for him."

Seeking to strengthen their paltry offensive forces, the New Jersey Devils recalled another Olympian, American center Brian Rolston. But don't feel too bad for the Devils; they have a rock-solid defense and more depth in goal than almost any two teams combined. As a further measure to put more pucks in the net, New Jersey could deal one of its many netminders for some scoring, possibly with Winnipeg.

The Devils could gamble and send Rookie of the Year Martin Brodeur westward for Keith Tkachuk, who would fit the Devils' system like a glove, or be a little more conservative and ship one of the AHL's top two goalies, Mike Dunham or Corey Schwab, for Nelson Emerson or Alexei Zhamnov. The latter might be more appealing in that Emerson and Zhamnov are centers, New Jersey's weakest position, while Tkachuk skates left wing.

If the Devils do export one of these masked men, that pushes UNH's Mike Heinke up the ladder. UNH Sports Information Director Pete Dauphinais said he's gotten a lot of calls from New Jersey front office folks for stats on Heinke,

Field hockey announces one top recruit signing; others expected soon

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team announced one big name recruit yesterday, and two others who are verbal recruits are expected to be announced today.

Before coach Megan Donnelly even arrived in her office for yesterday's signing day, one of her prize recruits' official paperwork was already waiting for her.

Forward Erica Johnston of Enfield, Conn., decided to pass up the recruiting of national champion James Madison to become a Minutewoman.

"I think [UMass] was her first love way back," Donnelly said. "I think she always intended to come here. Her eyes just kind of lit up when she was here."

Johnston arrives as one of the nation's top high school players. She was an All-American her senior year and is a member of the United States Under-18 National Squad and will compete in this summer's Olympic Festival.

Johnston joins a team that struggled to score last season. Her scoring ability could be a valuable asset.

"She's a threat," Donnelly said. "She's explosive and exciting. I'm thrilled [to get her]. She's just an excellent player."

Massachusetts has reportedly also received verbal commitments from two other top players, forward/midfielder Kate Putnam and defender Laura Phelan, who both grew up watching the Minutewomen.

Putnam, a Greenfield native, played under coach Donna Woodcock, who also helped groom former Minutewoman forward Tara Jelley.

The similarities between the two seem to end there. When Jelley first came to UMass, she was very fast but her skills were unrefined. Putnam's talents are much more polished at this stage in her career. While Putnam admired Jelley and watched her play, she said the decision to stay in the Pioneer Valley was a personal one.

"I watched her play, and that brought me to watch [UMass]," she said. "But I'm going to UMass for me."

Putnam has the ability to play both forwad and midfield, and with the graduation of Danielle Borges and Colleen Duffy, she could see time at either spot.

Putnam and Johnston are teammates on the U.S. Under-18 National Team, where both players may have a chance to work somewhat with former/future UMass coach Pam Hixon, who is on a two-year hiatus coaching the U.S. National Team.

> "She's explosive and exciting. She's just an excellent player."
> -Coach Megan Donnelly

Putnam was also recruited by Providence and BC, but she decided to play for the team she grew up watching to give her a chance to be part of the UMass tradition.

"I'm excited," she said, citing her work ethic as one of her strongest attributes. "I love field hockey. Ever since I started I've had a burning desire to win. Because of that, I've developed a strong work ethic."

Phelan's ties to the program are more personal than Putnam's. Her sister Cathy has a strong career as a back for UMass.

Phelan hails from Mountain Top, Penn., in the field hockey hotbed of Pennsylvania that produced current Minutewomen Kyle Rothenberger and Amy Ott.

At 5 feet 8 inches, Phelan could be a valuable addition to a defense that loses two key members in Kyri Sparks and Natalie Hart.

Donnelly could not comment on Putnam or Phelan because NCAA regulations prohibit coaches from talking about verbal recruits until all the official paperwork has been filed.

In addition to the freshmen, the Minutewomen will be aided by the return of Sharon Hughes (mononucleosis) and Jen Gutzman (anterior cruciate ligament) who both should be healthy in time for the fall season.

Regan making strides in young career

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Who can be wise, amaz'd, temperate and furious,
Loyal and neutral, in a moment?
— Macbeth

The Thane of Cawdor answered himself, "No man," but if he were real and somehow met University of Massachusetts hockey goaltender Brian Regan, how wrong he would seem.

Regan, a freshman native of New Milford, Conn., draft choice of the NHL's Hartford Whalers as well as a Shakespeare buff, is a deep character. He shuns proverbial goalie stereotypes — he's not quirky or religiously superstitious — he just stands in his net and keeps out pucks.

A lot of pucks. Regan thrives on pressure — when there is none, occasionally he falters. In the second period of a 3-3 tie with Bowdoin, Regan faced one shot. It went in.

Then he faced 53 when UMass pulled one of the year's most shocking upsets in all sports, a stone slung at No. 1 Maine. Two went in.

Even in his first year, Regan was ready for prime time — that is, his freshman year at the Westminster School when he started in net and took the Simsbury, Conn. school to the New England Prep semi-finals. It went one step further in Regan's sophomore year, advancing to the finals.

Regan did have a stellar supporting cast from 1990-1992. A roll of Westminster alumni reads like a Hockey East All- Star team: South Hadley and Providence's Chad Quenneville, Boston College's Ryan Haggerty, UNH's Eric Boguniecki and Steve Pleau all played for Westminster coach Tom Earl, who recognized Regan's potential immediately.

"We thought from the start he was exceptional," Earl said. "He's a very mentally tough goalie. He played in difficult games his first two years that helped him move along."

"At Westminster, hockey was everything, the profile — almost like basketball is here," Regan said. "So far this year the pressure has been similar to what I felt there, but it's almost electrifying now."

One has to wonder what possesses you to let people fire in your direction vulcanized rubber discs at speeds close to 100 miles per hour. Of course, it happened by accident that Regan first played the position.

"My older brother [Terry] was a defenseman [at New Milford High School] and we used to always play street hockey together, and since I was younger I got stuck in net," Regan said.

"The following year I tried it on the ice, and I loved it. The best thing about [goaltending] is the challenge of either being the hero or the goat. You're either the star of the game or you get blamed for a lot."

Regan's family not only piqued his interest in goaltending but fostered it as well.

"My brother and father always worked with me, they were my coaches when I was growing up," Regan said. He also credits his youth hockey coach at Bridgeport, Paul Struble, for teaching him goaltending's fundamentals.

Regan manages to look good when the score is downright ugly. UMass was blasted 7-2 in its first meeting with Maine, but Regan stopped 18 of 19 shots in 28 minutes of action.

In his debut at Boston College on Oct. 30, 1994, Regan made 18 stops in a 4-2 losing cause, but UMass outscored BC 2-1 at even strength.

PAUL BILODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Regan had a brutal outing in UMass' return to Chesinut Hill, as he was burned for six goals without finishing the contest. Enough to deflate some rookies' confidence, but not Regan's.

"He can take the ups and downs that go with goaltending," Earl said. "He'll play a bad period but it doesn't affect him. He's very quick and very confident."

Quickness is just one aspect of Regan's style. He uses his glove like a shortstop, scooping loose pucks whenever possible, and he remains forever focused.

"One of the things the coaches have worked with me on is never giving up, fight through everything," Regan said.

"I'm a little more disciplined now. I only go down when necessary. When I first got here, I'd go down on almost everything, and I'd give up a rebound and wouldn't be able to make a second save. I've cut down my rebounds and I'm staying on my feet more."

Regan could have landed with a much higher profile program or played junior hockey, as a number of his teammates did before arriving in Amherst. Terry Regan also played with Milford of the old New England Junior hockey League. Regan was recruited by BU, UNH, Lake Superior State, Providence and UMass-Lowell, but came to UMass for logical reasons.

"One reason is the building we're sitting in," Regan said at the William D. Mullins Center. "Coaches [Joe] Mallen and [Assistant Coach Bob] Deraney were both goaltenders, but

UM seeks new vice chancellor

■ Firm hired to assist in the committee's search for viable candidate to fill the vacancy

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is on a nationwide search for a new vice chancellor for university advancement.

The individual appointed to the position will be responsible for development, alumni relations and University public relations.

"The person will hold a key position for the University, serving a number of functions," said Paul Page, vice chancellor of administration and finance. "This will be a critical position in the next couple of years."

> "The person will hold a key position for the University, serving a number of functions ...This will be a critical position in the next couple of years."

With the recent proposal to reduce state funding for the University, finding a candidate with an aggressive fund raising capacity is very important for its survival, Page said.

The new vice chancellor will be responsible for a capital fund raising campaign that could potentially raise over $50 million, according to Leheny.

"[The campaign] will be the largest fund raising program in the institution's history," Leheny said.

According to Page, the candidate will need to be able to enhance things at the University, and create a positive image of the University by providing positive and accurate information through public relations.

This entails good relations with alumni, state and federal governments, Page said.

A 16-member search committee has been convened by Chancellor David K. Scott. The committee will recommend three to five candidates for the position, one of which will be appointed vice chancellor.

"The search committee has only begun to deliberate about the qualities and experience a successful candidate should have," said Associate Chancellor Jim Leheny, chair of the search committee.

The committee will attempt to fill the position by July 1, or as soon as possible, Leheny said.

The position is currently filled on an interim basis by Ron Story, who announced in December that he would step down. He plans on teaching in the history department by the fall semester of 1995.

The 16-member search committee consists of assorted UMass staff and faculty, an undergraduate and a graduate student and a trustee.

Advertisements have been placed in three different national periodicals, Leheny said. Affirmative action offices in the northeastern region of the United States have also been notified of the nationwide search.

"We encourage the recruitment and hiring of individuals from under-represented groups in higher education," Leheny said.

Barnes & Roche, Inc., a private recruiting firm based in Rosemont, Pa., has been hired to help locate appropriate candidates, Leheny said.

Barnes & Roche, Inc. is a fund raising consulting firm with an executive search branch retained by clients to help fill higher level positions. Positions include company vice presidents and directors, as well as college and university positions, according to Pat Hoffmagle, the executive search secretary for the firm.

Candidates are instructed to submit applications to Barnes & Roche, Inc., Hoffmagle said.

"It is an intensive effort in the sense that we're using a search firm that has staff working full-time," Leheny said.

The Chronicle of Higher Education, a weekly newspaper with a wide circulation among university administrators, is publishing an announcement of the position, Leheny said. They routinely carry about 30 pages of advertisements.

The Chronicle of Philanthropy, a bi-weekly newspaper oriented towards people in the development and fund raising fields, will be the second to cover the advertisement, Leheny said.

Black Issues in Higher Education, a bi-weekly magazine primarily focused on minority concerns, is the third periodical running the advertisement for vice chancellor, Leheny said.

As of Thursday afternoon, Barnes & Roche, Inc. had received ten applications. They are expecting an influx of many more after advertisements continue to appear, Hoffmagle said.

Massachusetts legislature passes welfare reform bill

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — A sweeping welfare bill described as the toughest in the country easily passed the Legislature yesterday, as lawmakers voted to force thousands of poor people to go work and to cut welfare checks for many others.

The bill was approved by the House 133-21 and the Senate 31-3. Gov. William F. Weld, who has been fighting for more than a year to require welfare recipients to get jobs, said he planned to sign it Friday.

"It looks to be the radical reform we've been working for," Weld said. "I think this is what we need to try to get the incentives in the welfare system in the right place...It's going to be better for the people who are receiving the benefits, because they're not going to be stuck in that system."

If it gets clearance from the federal government to implement the program, Massachusetts would go farther than any other state in the growing national movement to overhaul the welfare system, supporters of the bill said.

"It represents a total change in the way we look at public assistance," said state Sen. Therese Murray, D-Plymouth, who spent part of her childhood in public housing.

"I think it will become a national model," she said.

The legislation, however, angered several hundred welfare mothers who stormed the Statehouse to protest the action. Eight people were arrested, mostly for disorderly conduct. One person was charged with assaulting a police officer.

"We're being called irresponsible. Our children are being called illegitimate," said Lisa Sanderson, a 26-year-old welfare mother from Framingham.

The bill would force able-bodied parents with school-age children, those six and older, to go to work within 60 days, either in private sector jobs or in state-funded community service. Officials said this would apply to about 18,400 people, who would have to work at least 20 hours a week. That represents more than 17 percent of the state's overall welfare caseload of 104,000 families, and more than one-third of the able-bodied welfare population.

The bill also would set a two-year time limit on welfare payments for able-bodied adults, although the state could grant extensions under certain hardship cases.

Other major provisions would:

• Stop paying extra money to welfare mothers who have additional children, cutting $90 per month per additional child.

• Halt welfare checks for teenage mothers who don't finish high school and don't live at home or a group home.

• Cut welfare checks for all able-bodied recipients by 2.75 percent, or about $15 a month. As a tradeoff, welfare clients would be able to keep more of their earnings if they get low-wage jobs that don't pay enough to get them off welfare.

Health Services to get a dosage of own medicine

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

It is time for an inspection, and the University of Massachusetts Health Services (UHS) are going to have their turn under the microscope.

UHS is due for its tri-annual accreditation, according to Pam Wermuth, manager of facilities and ancillary services. The evaluation will be conducted over a three-day period, between Feb. 27 and Mar. 1.

Anyone who is involved, or serviced, by UHS has the opportunity to come forward and voice their concerns to the agency which will undertake this evaluation, Wermuth said.

"This is the chance for people who have concerns about UHS to address them," Wermuth said. "If students want to talk about something with the accreditors, they must make a written request."

The Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations (JCAHO) will sweep through the UHS inspecting 26 aspects of the facility over the three-day period.

JCAHO is a national accreditation agency which accredits ambulatory and health care centers, according to Wermuth. Every three years the agency comes to evaluate the institution.

People who are concerned or have complaints about the service, facilities or any other aspect of the UHS can write a letter requesting an interview, Wermuth said.

The interviews, which will be held during the three-day accreditation

Holyoke women's shelter seeks student volunteers

By Colleen D. Shanahan
Collegian Staff

HOLYOKE — Battered women and teens in Holyoke need your help.

The Womanshelter/Compañeras shelter in Holyoke is recruiting volunteers to assist with their emergency hotline and counseling program.

"Some women don't know what their options are; the legal advocate and volunteers offer extra counseling and support to help them," said Edith Jennings-Wigfall, the volunteer coordinator at the shelter.

Womanshelter/Compañeras is a small grass roots shelter offering a safe haven for battered women.

As of now, Jennings-Wigfall is searching for volunteers to assist with the Legal Emergency Assistance (LEA) and Teen Dating Violence Awareness (TDVA) programs.

Volunteers would work one or two nights a week answering the 24-hour emergency hotline. The volunteers would offer assistance, help the caller make decisions as to what course of action would best suit the situation, and perhaps offer further counseling.

In the event the person opts to obtain a restraining order or a vacate order against her attacker, the legal advocate would accompany her in court. According to Jennings-Wigfall, most women do not have any problems obtaining restraining orders, but some judges might not extend the order after speaking with the alleged abuser. The legal advocate would be there to help the woman plead her case.

The TDVA volunteers visit area schools and conduct education programs on teen dating violence.

Jennings-Wigfall said the program usually starts with the middle school grades but the volunteers have been asked to lecture in freshman college classes as well.

The program teaches teens, through handouts and videos, how to recognize what a healthy relationship is and what to do if the relationship is unsafe.

"Boys especially sometimes feel challenged by the program. If his dad did this to his mom, or this is how his brother treats his wife, if he sees the abuse he might think that it's okay for him to do it too. Girls also might feel the same way...as if this is the way dating should be," said Jennings-Wigfall.

The ultimate goal of TDVA is to make teens aware of what violence actually is. "Kids have a lot of questions about this and what they should do if they recognize signs of abuse," she went on to say.

To enroll in the LEA and TDVA volunteer seminars, contact Edith Jennings-Wigfall at 538-9717, or, if you need help, the hotline can be reached at 536-1628.

Panel debates US foreign policy

Split seen in Republican party on issue of defense budget cuts

By Michael Davis
Collegian Correspondent

The Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies presented a panel on "The Republican Congress and U.S. Foreign Policy" Wednesday night.

The panel was comprised of Vinnie Ferraro of Mount Holyoke College, Greg White of Smith College, and Michael Klare of Hampshire College, and was held at the Franklin Patterson Building at Hampshire College.

In speaking on the title topic, an issue which has been discussed relatively little in the three months since the Republican party won control of the Senate, the three panelists agreed that both the Democratic and Republican parties have failed to articulate a formulated foreign policy, and that the parties are essentially in political congruence.

Ferraro pointed to a longstanding split in the Republican ideologies between internationalist and isolationist foreign policies. The former represents interests in free markets and military power, whereas the latter holds no interests in such foreign engagement.

Clinton is an isolationist with strong interests in involvement with particular foreign matters, though the character of the congress can have the power to sway that balance, Ferraro said.

White continued, pointing out that the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) was indicative of how the foreign actions of either the Democratic or Republican parties have converged on key foreign policies.

According to White, President Clinton and the Democrats have shown that their interests in foreign policy do not diverge greatly from that of the Republican party. For example, the recent lending of $40 billion to the Mexican government was initially attacked and discredited by House Speaker Newt Gingrich, only to later on call it an act of 'courage' on behalf of the President, said White.

Additionally, Klare focused on what the near future within the Republican ranks will be. He said that the important issue to look for will be the split within the Republican party itself, as opposed to a division amongst Republicans and Democrats.

According to Klare, this divergence within Republicans will show one side which will concentrate on the importance of defense spending, and another side which will look to "cutting the pork" out of defense.

Overall, the message was that Democrats and Republicans differ very little in foreign policy and that neither have clear ideas of what their future programs will be. Klare said "not to expect any major shifts in the long run" and that "it is worrisome that there is a lack of ideas" in U.S. foreign policy.

Moreover, the Republicans who will commit to heavy military spending will be "pushed to invent new enemies" in opposition to by the aforementioned isolationists who prefer to minimize this type of spending.

Grants offered for Jewish programs

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

The "Leadership Training Subsidy" is one of many available grants for students interested in Jewish issues.

The grant is for students who are interested in attending conferences anywhere around the nation.

According to Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, it is very easy to apply for the grant, which is provided by Herman and Judith Swartz. All that is required is to pick up an application for the subsidy which is available at the Hillel House.

Perlmutter described it as a "very simple, one page, low- bureaucracy application." Next, said Perlmutter, give a copy of the information about the conference the student is interested in to Hillel. The processing of the application takes only a couple days, according to Perlmutter.

The amount of money available depends on how much the conference costs, and is determined on a case by case basis. In the past, amounts given have ranged from $100-180.

There are many conferences coming up which could be applicable for people who would like a grant.

Conferences include "a weekend conference for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Jewish college students and young adults," on March 3-5, a summer program at Camp Swig in Saratoga, Calif., and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee National Policy Conference in Washington D.C. from May 7-9.

Also available are SPrInG grants, which according to Perlmutter stands for "Student Project Incentive Grants."

Perlmutter said these grants are a "way to help Jewish students who want to do any type of Jewish related programming on campus to do it.

"[Students] just have to let us know what it is and what kind of help they need to do it."

He said the idea behind the grants was "to stimulate the creativity and initiative" of students.

Programs done with the help of this grant include groups doing a study break to talk about Jewish issues and a Chanukah party that was put on in a dorm.

Perlmutter reiterated that he wanted students to come up with their own ideas for what they might want to do.

There is also a book at the Hillel House that people are free to stop by and look at, according to Perlmutter. The book has a list of scholarships and other grants that are available to students.

The last possibility available is money for trips to Israel, including scholarships to Hebrew University and Ben Gurion University.

Bruno's goes bankrupt, sold to new owners

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Bruno's Pizza filed for bankruptcy and was sold on Wednesday.

Bruno's filed for bankruptcy at the end of November 1993 because it owed about $100,000 in back taxes to the Massachusetts Department of Revenue, said G. Devon Bascomb, lawyer for Bruno's Inc.

"The Department of Revenue seized the business, and then Mr. Broderick filed for bankruptcy," said Bascomb.

William Broderick, the owner of Bruno's Inc., acquired the Amherst pizza restaurant in March 1988 from founder Bruno Materazo, who presently owns and operates Antonio's Pizza in downtown Amherst, said Chris Sarage, manager of Antonio's.

Bascomb said Broderick was unaware of the back taxes owed when the state audited Bruno's Inc. shortly after he acquired the business.

"I believe the prior owner claims the Department of Revenue was lying," said Bascomb.

Bascomb said the back taxes were owed from unaccounted profits which predate Broderick's ownership.

Materazo said when he and Broderick signed the agreement concerning the sale of Bruno's Inc, the responsibility of any potential back taxes were his concern and not Broderick's.

Materazo said Broderick filed for bankruptcy due to rent he owed to Materazo, who owns the 363 Main St. property, and because of declining sales since he took control.

"As far as I'm concerned, I don't owe any past or present taxes," said Materazo. "Maybe he's trying to shift the blame."

Last Thursday the hearing was held in Bankruptcy Court where Bruno's Inc. was sold through bidding. Bids for the company were placed on Feb. 7.

Materazo said he hopes that the judge will divert some money of the sale to him for months of rent Broderick owes him.

Over a dozen business people familiar with the pizza industry from as far east as Framingham placed bids, Bascomb said.

George and Elaine Pananias, a local couple from South Deerfield, won the bidding process Thursday, Bascomb said.

The business will remain open until the end of the month when the Pananiases take over the management of the company, said Bascomb.

Materazo said he is familiar with the Pananiases who once owned a pizza restaurant, and he is currently trying to establish a lease for the store from.

Bascomb said he does not know when the Pananiases exactly intend to take over the management of the company.

Abortion battle rages over surgeon general nominee

By Nita Lelyveld
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Six Democratic senators, five of them women, stood up for embattled surgeon general nominee Henry Foster Jr. on Thursday. But a Republican said President Clinton should withdraw the nomination and avoid "a very controversial two months" he can ill afford.

Clinton restated his confidence in Foster, a doctor who has drawn strong criticism from abortion foes since saying last week he had performed abortions.

Foster, who made the case for himself Wednesday night on ABC-TV's "Nightline," scheduled a speech for Friday at a local medical school as the Democrats attempted to regain the offensive on his nomination.

At a Capitol news conference, Sen. Carol Moseley-Braun of Illinois said, "The issue really is not abortion in this debate. The issue is the extremist attacks which will result in a sign going up: Surgeon general wanted. No physician need apply." Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J. called the anti-abortion opposition a "witch hunt."

And Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., who serves on the committee that will hold hearings on Foster, called attacks on him "outrageous ... not American." She said, "If this toxic atmosphere continues to keep up, I don't know who will volunteer to serve in the Cabinet or Cabinet-level posts of the United States of America."

In his TV interview, Foster said he hated abortion. But he also said that, after checking his records, he had determined he had performed 39, not "fewer than a dozen" as he had said last week. Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind., also a member of the committee that would hold hearings on Foster, said he would ask Clinton to withdraw the nomination.

"I think there's a litmus test here, but it's not abortion. And the litmus test is truth," he said. "At this point the president and Dr. Foster's versions of the truth seem to be changing every day."

"What they're looking at is a very controversial two months," Coats said of the administration. "I think the president can ill afford that."

period, will include health care and safety issues brought to the attention of the support department by UHS patients.

Quality of care, medical records, administration, infection control and equipment management are some things the accreditors will be looking at, Wermuth said. Quality assessment and improvement, the pharmacy, labs and short stay will also be reviewed.

"We are just going to keep doing what we're doing," said Wermuth, who does not anticipate any problems with the upcoming survey.

The Health Service accreditation is "just like having company," Wermuth said. The "company" will use their book of standards to inspect all aspects of UHS.

UHS has been evaluated by the agency four times since 1982, Wermuth said. Any problems found in the past have been documented in an accreditors report.

"The report usually takes about a month to prepare and reach UHS," Wermuth said. "We work on problems cited in the report so they are remedied by the next time the accreditors come."

Requests must be mailed at least five business days prior to the accreditation. They can be sent to the Survey Operations and Support Department of JCAHO at One Renaissance Boulevard, Oakbrook Terrace, IL, 60181.

WOMEN making WAVES

Compiled by Colleen D. Shanahan

First lady

History was made last Thursday when Lieut. Col. Eileen M. Collins became the first woman to pilot a NASA spaceship.

Collins was second in command of the six-member crew. In orbit, she steered the shuttle, fired small rockets, and helped monitor flight instruments.

If everything on the mission runs smoothly, Collins will be promoted to space shuttle commander by the end of the decade.

Collins realized years ago that the competition was stiff and she would have to work twice as hard to reach her goals. "I realized there is a lot of pressure on me. I can't afford to fail because I will be hurting chances for young women who want to come here some day," said Collins.

Tough love?

The parents, brother, and cousin of a 15-year-old Turkish girl were recently sentenced in the strangling death of the teen.

The family members were sentenced to jail terms from 20 years to life imprisonment. The family claimed the girl had become too Westernized and had dishonored the family.

A senior Muslim clergyman testified that the Koran did not sanction the family's actions and would not excuse the behavior.

The family admitted to plotting the death of the girl because she had a French boyfriend and the family was obsessed with determining whether or not the victim had lost her virginity.

Sexual abuse

Italians are up in arms over a sexual abuse ruling.

The case involved a young woman who had been abused since she was six years old and finally persuaded by her boyfriend to report the abuse.

The trials and convictions came and went and it was the final ruling that angered the Italians. The Supreme Court overturned three guilty verdicts and ordered a new trial on the grounds that judges failed to consider the family's environment, where such abuse may have been condoned, which could have been different from the rest of Italian families.

The Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano called the ruling the result of "perverse logic."

Showing Progress

Fifty-two percent of Fortune 500 companies now have women on their corporate boards.

Catalyst, a non-profit consulting and research group conducted surveys of top companies, rating the progress of women in business.

The survey reports an 11 percent increase in woman directors in Fortune 1,000 companies. However, out of 11,790 corporate board seats, only 814 are held by women.

The survey noted that at least one woman served as a director in the 10 most profitable Fortune 500 companies and more than half of those companies had two woman directors.

Catalyst president Sheila Wellington said women are left out of corporate boards because executives fill positions with peers. There are only three chief executives in Fortune 1,000 companies.

With the increases in women's attainment of high level positions, Wellington predicts more women will become corporate board members.

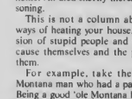
Living in a world full of idiots

The following is a public service announcement.

Not too long ago, an Ohio man was killed when he moved his gas grill into his living room in a failed attempt to cut down on winter heating bills. In another failed attempt at home heating, a Minneapolis man killed himself and his entire family after rigging up a tube that ran from the tail pipe of his car into the family's home. All died shortly thereafter of carbon monoxide poisoning.



David Copeland

This is not a column about improper ways of heating your house. It is a discussion of stupid people and the harm they cause themselves and the people around them.

For example, take the 20-year-old Montana man who had a party in October. Being a good 'ole Montana boy, there were plenty of spare shotguns in his house. Being the good host, he placed the butt of one of these guns (which he thought was unloaded) on the floor and placed his mouth over the barrel of the gun. His final words were, "Look everybody! I'm Kurt Cobain!"

As one of my friends (who is not stupid) said, "That's one less idiot we have to worry about."

And we do have to worry about idiots. They are members of a social problem that is growing unchecked and bound to kill us all.

Take, for instance, the Kentucky man who noticed that his hedges were starting to overgrow last summer as he mowed his lawn. They say that necessity is the mother of invention, but in this case, it was the mother of disaster. Oblivious to the fine invention called hedge clippers, the man hoisted his push mower above his hedges to make an attempt to trim them. Toll for his stupidity: six fingers and a thumb.

This is actually true stuff. I couldn't write anything this weird.

I have made a hobby of collecting anecdotes about morons. You can't read a newspaper without finding a tale about some mindless idiot who causes injury to himself or a loved one.

Everywhere we look, we see stupid people. I'm not labeling myself as a genius, but I do have enough native reason to not try to heat my house with carbon monoxide.

The problem is not limited to the uneducated. A North Carolina doctor, yes, a trained medical professional who spent dozens of years in school, was convinced that it was the drug AZT and not HIV that caused AIDS. To prove his point he injected himself with the HIV virus.

Although he has yet to contract AIDS from the virus, he forgot to ask himself a seemingly blatant question: If AZT causes AIDS, as he says, why did people die from AIDS before the drug AZT was developed?

Are you stupid? If you are, you're probably too stupid to notice. But having been able to read through this much of my column indicates that you may just have enough sense to not do something ignorant that will kill you.

Instead, you should be concerned with the big picture. We worry about welfare reform, drugs, AIDS and other social problems, but there has not been a public outcry about the moron factor that plagues us all. There is no public funding, support groups or institutions for the common sensibly challenged.

You might think that you're safe from stupid people here in the heart of the prestigious Five College Area. After all, with so many college students and professors, the stupid people must have been weeded out by now.

But in December, a UMass student, whose name will not be printed here to protect the ignorant, was arrested by Amherst police after they observed him urinating on the front lawn of the police station.

I can't speak for everybody, but I know my parents tried their hardest to potty train me before they sent me to college. "We don't care about your SAT scores," they said, "as long as you know where and when to go to the bathroom when we take you to Amherst."

And even if I had failed that insurmountable task before commencing with my freshman year, I am sure that no matter how drunk I have been I have always maintained enough intelligence to know that shaking the dew off my lily is not an appropriate activity when one is in plain view of the Amherst Police Station.

They criticize our basketball team for having less than average grades, and opposing fans have enjoyed calling the Minutemen dumb, but I have yet to read about Lou Roe or Marcus Camby taking a squirt in front of the police station.

Steps to balance the federal budget

A few days ago Congress made history by passing the line item veto which gives the President broad new powers.

The line item veto gives the President the ability to cut specific programs from the federal budget. Before the President either had to accept the budget that Congress sent to him, or reject the whole budget which would force Congress to rewrite a new one.

When the founding fathers wrote the Constitution, they left out an article about the line item veto.

The framers of the Constitution felt that a line item veto would give the President too much power and undermine the delicate checks and balances between the President and Congress.

However, when the founding fathers started the country, the federal government was small and the federal budget accounted for a small portion of the national economy.

Today the federal budget is a large part of the economy, and has major repercussions upon the economy.

The archaic establishment which lacked a line item veto allowed for abuses in the federal budget and deadlock.

The budget through out the 20th century has been full of pork barrel projects such as a helium reserve for zeppelin warfare established after World War I.

Because the budget is written by Congressmen who are accountable to their state constituents rather then the nation as a whole, they pack the budget with frivolous programs to help exclusively their own electorate.

However, the President is

Matthew Wurtzel

accountable to the nation as a whole, rather then a small sample of the nation.

Therefore the President is less likely to pass frivolous programs, and he is more likely to cut such programs from the budget.

If more superfluous fat is cut away from the budget, then less federal tax dollars will be wasted.

The line item veto also aids the balanced budget fever. If Congress does not balance the budget, then the President now has powers to take it upon himself to do so if he feels it necessary.

In addition to ending wasteful spending, deadlock over the budget will end.

In the past Presidents have continually rejected budgets which Congress presented to him because of a few minor programs.

If the budget was rejected — it often was — then Congress was forced to draft a new budget often taking until the last hours before the deadline.

Now the President can easily eliminate these unnecessary programs from the budget which will end the wasted time Congress spends trying to hammer out a budget over and over again.

However, if the President cuts a program which Congress feels is vital to the nation they can override the veto with a two-thirds vote.

If the President decided to cut a program such as the space program but Congress felt it was vital to the nation, then the Congress could attempt to override the veto.

The line item veto is a historic step towards change.

The line item veto will streamline the drafting of the federal budget as well as curtail the wasteful spending by Congressmen who are unconcerned with the nation as a whole.

Opinion/Editorial

More pressing issues exist

National pastime or national disaster?

While the nation continues to battle such problems as homelessness, hunger and crime, President Clinton seems to have a more important issue on his mind: baseball.

Caleb Cochran

In case you missed it, President Clinton has put himself in a most interesting position by involving himself in the negotiations between major league baseball's players and owners. The players have been on strike since August, and I guess the thought of a season played with replacement players is just too much for the president to handle. So, he has taken matters into his own hands.

Are you kidding me? I could barely contain my laughter when I saw television footage of player representatives Tom Glavine and Cecil Fielder marching into the White House as if they were on their way to take care of some important national business. I hate to break it to you guys, but the baseball strike does not exactly qualify as a national disaster.

In fact, although Clinton may be in a hurry to get baseball's problems solved, I won't even begin to think about the season until late June when NCAA basketball, NHL hockey and NBA basketball are all history. And even then, if ESPN gives me enough tennis to watch (please, no golf), the strike can go on forever for all I care.

Does the fact that Clinton has nothing better to do with his time than worry about baseball have anyone else scratching their head? Or am I the only American disgusted with this ridiculous waste of time and misuse of power? If the players and owners can't solve their problems on their own, that's too bad. I'm a baseball fan too, but there comes a point when enough is enough. Hire all the arbitrators and lawyers you want and you won't hear me complain, but there is just no way to justify government intervention.

If Clinton has time to worry about baseball, allow me to suggest a few other pressing issues in the world of sports he may want to tackle before acknowledging those back-burner issues such as health care and the deficit.

- The Super Bowl has been won by the NFC representative for each of the last 11 seasons. Perhaps Clinton could meet with player representatives from both conferences in an effort to make the big game something other than an annual blowout.
- Division I-A college football is in dire need of a post- season playoff system. Since the NCAA can't seem to get anything rolling, why not see what Clinton has to say on the matter?
- Clinton's hometown boys, the Arkansas Razorbacks, have fallen out of the top 10 in men's basketball. I think a meeting with the president to discuss tactics is absolutely imperative for head coach Nolan Richardson.
- Sports Illustrated recently ran a cover story on the crybabies of the NBA, such as Derrick Coleman and Scottie Pippen, whose bad attitudes are having a detrimental effect on the league. Since their coaches don't know what to do with these guys, I think it's about time the president stepped in to see what can be done about these players.

After, and only after, these disastrous problems in the world of sports are taken care of should the president turn to the more minor problems on his plate, such as poverty, hunger and AIDS. These problems can wait. But God forbid this horrible baseball strike should last another day.

Trouble comes faster than help

It's Sunday morning, Feb. 5, and you call up the Add/Drop phone registration to change one of your classes. But after entering in your student identification number, the voice on the system says that you're not a registered undergraduate. What do you do? You've been going to your classes and you suddenly discover that you're not a recognized student anymore.

David K. Chan

This is the story of my good friend, Lucy. She's not the only student that has been victimized by the extreme actions mentioned above. This problem has become wearisome and I'm going to present it through Lucy's experience.

When Lucy received her spring semester bill, she had to delay in paying it because she was going to appeal her financial aid package (which was more like a blank postcard instead of a package). She sent in her appeal to the financial aid office last November.

But December and January passed by with no response. Why did the financial aid office take such a lax approach to her appeal? Why couldn't they notify Lucy about her application? Was she supposed to use her extra sensory perception all the way from Mexico to figure out the result of her appeal?

When the first week of classes rolled around, Lucy went to her classes. There was still no response from financial aid. But little did Lucy know that the Bursar's office was cooking up a real surprise for her.

Without a warning, Lucy was withdrawn from the University on Friday. There was no letter, no phone call, no flashing red lights, no skull and crossbones, nothing. The most extreme penalty was given without a warning. Is this fair? If Lucy had ESP, she would have done something about this dilemma. Maybe the Bursar's office didn't realize this, but after all, getting kicked out of your school is a pretty big deal to Lucy.

But maybe Lucy does have a little ESP because on Sunday she was suddenly compelled to call the Add/Drop system. That was when she discovered that her I.D. card was worth nothing more than a wallet stuffer. Lucy was withdrawn. She cried all night. Many questions raced through her mind. Am I still a Minutewoman? Are they going to kick me out of my dorm? Can I still eat at the dining commons? Oh no, not the DC!

On Monday, the next day, Lucy went to the financial aid office to discuss her appeal application. To her surprise, it didn't take long for her loans and grants to be approved. The package met her need.

But why wasn't this done by financial aid before? Why did Lucy have to go into the office to request that someone review her application? Why did the process of helping Lucy take so long while the process of penalizing her was done so quickly?

After the bill was settled, Lucy was enrolled again. But the adventure didn't stop there. Lucy had to re-register for her classes. With the University already over-populated, Lucy could just imagine the difficulties in attempting to register for a class.

Presently, Lucy is on the waiting list for two classes that she was previously enrolled in. Ironically, when she went to the Registrar's office to get a copy of her schedule, she was actually considered one of the "lucky ones."

Lucy couldn't be luckier.

Letters Policy

Another semester, another series of events resulting in a slew of editorials. Interested in being part of that deluge? Well, come on down to the Campus Center basement with typed letters and columns in hand and we'll be more than happy to help you out.

All the weekly and biweekly columnist spots are filled for the semester, but there is extra space, so don't let that discourage you.

When writing, please TYPE your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

Art exhibit celebrates heroes of the Holocaust

By Amy Paradysz
Collegian Staff

A photographer and writer have proven that there is some hope to be found in the Holocaust. A photo exhibit, "Rescuers of the Holocaust: Portraits by Gay Block," is at Amherst College at the Mead Art Museum until Feb. 26.

Photographer Gay Block and writer Malka Drucker spent three years finding, photographing and interviewing some of those rescuers, many of whom received the Yad Vashem Medal. The inscription on the medal states, "Who saves one life, it is as if they saved the whole world."

Tens of thousands of people acted as "rescuers" during the war, doing everything from making fake IDs for Jews, bringing food to those in hiding and making Jewish children a part of their own families. These rescuers were ordinary people; the only thing they had in common was that they risked their lives for Jewish ones.

Block's giant color portraits of the rescuers are framed alongside smaller black-and-white photographs from family albums, and handwritten excerpts from the interviews, in a scrapbook-like format. Block's photography captures the rescuers as regular people. They are sprawled out on armchairs, puffing on cigarettes, serving tea and showing off a pet turtle.

Most of the rescuers told Drucker they didn't want to be called heroes. An inscription by Gitta Bauer next to her photo read, "I'm still ashamed of my people, my country, deeply ashamed." The German woman didn't think she deserved the Yad Vashem Medal because she only saved one life.

Andree Guelond Hersouici began working with the Committee to Defend the Jews (CDJ) when she was twenty years old.

"When I told them I wanted to help, they asked me if I would be willing to risk my life, to change my identity," she told Drucker. "When you feel you're doing something necessary, fear is in the background."

The Mead Museum is usually a quiet place, but Wednesday morning there was a group of students visiting from Pelham Elementary School.

"I thought it was brave of people to risk their lives and put themselves in danger," said 10-year-old Katie Kondorgen. When asked whether she would have done it, she thought for a minute, then said, "I don't know."

At 20 years old, rescuer Marion P. von Binsbergen Pritchard shot a Dutch Nazi policeman to save a family she was hiding. Pritchard, who is now a psychoanalyst in Vermont, will speak about her own experience in a talk entitled "Rescue in the Netherlands," Feb. 12 at 3 p.m. in the Converse Assembly Room at Amherst College.

The "Rescuers" exhibit is accompanied by a 24-minute video by Gay Block, in which the photographed rescuers comment on their experiences.

The exhibit "Rescuers of the Holocaust: Portraits by Gay Block" is at the Mead Art Museum at the east side of the Amherst College quadrangle. Admission is free. Museum hours are 10 a.m. – 4:30 p.m. daily. For more information or to schedule tours, please call (413) 542-2335.

Notes looks at Grammys and Hall of Fame

Beastie Boys. Beastie Boys. Beastie Boys. It seems to be the band that is on everyone's tongues, all across campus. Will the altern.a-rap trio be bringing their hyper-kinetic show to our own Mullins Center? Popular rumor seems to say so. But of course it is nothing more than just that — rumor. Remember, how many times has Pearl Jam been supposedly playing the Spring Concert? Exactly.

Yawn. Oh, I'm sorry I just finished reading this year's Grammy nominations. By now it has become cliche to bash the Grammy Awards for their naivety towards the music world (please, no more Jethro Tull and Metallica jokes), but you would think that after facing extensive ridicule they might try to make even a small improvement. Maybe next year, because this year is just more of the same. Crash Test Dummies nominated for best alternative act? Mmmm, mmmm, I don't think so. The only thing Crash Test Dummies are alternative to is good music. Sheryl Crow is nominated in about every other category (pretty face; tepid songs — she's a shoe-in). I think even those swinging Swedes Ace Of Base managed to walk away with a few nominations. Sigh.

J. Mascis (pictured on the right) of Dinosaur Jr. will once again grace the Valley with his musical stylings.

It was nice seeing Neil Young receiving his due at this past month's Rock N' Roll Hall Of Fame ceremony. Young truly is a musical pioneer, having travelled so much ground in his extensive career. In fact, the whole event was surprisingly enjoyable (thanks to our friends at MTV who decided to air it... 1,000 times) sans the obligatory "jam" at the end, which found Young sharing the stage with the likes of such legends as Led Zeppelin (who would have created quite a stir playing together, if it wasn't marred by that whole Page and Plant thing). What could have been one of rock n' roll's greater moments looked more like a sad scene straight out of the geriatric ward.

All hail Mascis. Yes, J. Mascis, the charismatic frontman for Dinosaur Jr. will be playing a solo show at the Iron Horse. By now it is not really news when Mascis, an Amherst native, plays in the area (but hey, we still love him). But what of Sebadoh, the Valley's other (and lately everyone else's) favorite sons? The band rarely ever shows their faces in the Valley, but it seems as if this will come to an end. The band is tentatively set to finish their ongoing tour at near-by Westfield State College sometime in mid- March. Definitely worth checking out.

Sonic Youth on Rhino Records? Although hard to believe, later this month the label famous for putting out re-issues of dust-covered albums from the "where are they now?" bin will be re-releasing the ultra-rare SY disc Made In USA. The "album" is actually the soundtrack for director Ken Friedman's obscure 1988 film of the same name. Freshly remixed by the band, Made In USA should be interesting as what Thurston Moore describes as "an odd compromise between New York City avant-gardisters and Hollywood hitmen."

In other re-issue news, DGC is set to release the infamous Ciccone Youth Whitey Album features members of SY as well as alternative rock luminaries Mike Watt and Greg Ginn.

Well, it looks like Jawbreaker's fifteen minutes of fame may be just around the corner. After releasing one of the best (and most drastically under-rated) albums of last year, 'this Bay Area punk trio is teetering on the brink of national success. With major label courtship already underway, expect these guys to finally get the recognition they so desperately deserve.

"We're like 'Star Trek': the original series and Bikini Kill are like 'Star Trek: The Next Generation,'" proclaimed Go- Go's rhythm guitarist Jane Wiedlin in a desperate cry for credibility at a recent show in which the infamous Riot Grrrl band opened. I mean, if Belinda Carlisle is punk, then so is Mariah Carey.

Alas, after three albums and way too many overplayed singles, Living Colour has finally decided to call it quits — much to the chagrin of both their fans.

ference to use a two division format which is similar to the style used in the Southeastern Conference.

"We decided that divisions is the way to go," said Bruno. "We have not begun to approach which way we would divide the teams."

While expansion has been rumored for some time, Bruno said that it was not a necessity and the decision to expand was made because three schools were attractive to the conference.

"We were not in a rush to expand, unless the right institutions became available," Bruno said. "We said let's go for quality. We were able to fill out our conference with three quality institutions."

The athletic directors from all three of the new schools were pleased at the announcement.

"This is a very exciting day," said Dayton Athletic Director Ted Kissle. "This is a renewal of old friendships and great rivalries."

"We think that the A-10 will be very good for Virginia Tech," said Va. Tech Athletic Director David Blaine. "We have established an Eastern identity and this will continue to enhance it.

"We feel we can be ffighly competitive in all of our sports in the A-10."

"We are elated to be entering the Atlantic 10 conference," said LaSalle Athletic Director Bob Mullen.

The addition of the three schools increases the number of new A-10 schools to five as Xavier and Fordham have also announced their commitment to joining the conference next year.

Bruno said that no other schools would be added for next year.

right on the button when he said that the crowd in Washington, D.C., was "electric." And the Massachusetts crowds, well ...

It has its moments.

I'll be the first one to say that it's tough for a crowd to make the transition in the sense that Massachusetts is expected to win these days. The crowds at West Virginia and George Washington were rooting for the underdog. If their teams didn't win, hell, they weren't expected to anyway. Being the underdog gives a fan extra incentives.

And since the Minutemen were the No. 1 team for five straight weeks and have flirted around the top five all season, there's virtually no chance for them to be in that position this year.

• I saw coach Roy Johnson in town a few days back, and he mentioned how his men's gymnastics team have two guys who are No. 1 in the nation in their events — Ruslan Shupak on the vault and Kevin Schwartz on the still rings.

Next up for them is tomorrow's meet at 7 p.m. in the Cage against Temple.

Roof named football defensive coordinator

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football coaching staff received more off-season shuffling when Minuteman assistant coach Ted Roof was named defensive coordinator yesterday.

The Collegian reported on Jan. 31 that Roof would be named to fill the vacancy left by former defensive coordinator Jerry Azzinaro, who took an assistant coaching job with Iowa State. Massachusetts head coach Mike Hodges announced the appointment of Roof, which confirmed the report.

"Ted has proven himself to be a knowledgeable coach, who I feel can help us continue our defensive tradition," Hodges said. "He has had a big impact as both a coach and a recruiter."

Roof came to Massachusetts last year to coach the defensive line and serve as recruiting coordinator for the Minutemen. He had coached defensive ends and linebackers at Duke for four years prior to joining Hodges' staff.

"I'm very excited about the challenge," Roof said. "Massachusetts has played great defense for a long time and I look forward to the challenge of trying to uphold that tradition."

Ted Roof

Last season, the Massachusetts defense was ranked first in the Yankee Conference and No. 13 in the nation, allowing 284.7 yards per game. The Minutemen finished 15th in the country in pass efficiency defense with a 95.6 rating.

Roof was a three-year starter at inside linebacker for Georgia Tech and served as a graduate assistant at Alabama from 1987–88.

He was also the inside linebackers coach and strength and conditioning coordinator at West Georgia College and has coached every defensive spot but the secondary.

Roof, a 1987 graduate of Georgia Tech, earned All-ACC honors with the Yellow Jackets before he was drafted by the Jacksonville Bulls of the USFL. He later signed a free agents contract with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Hodges also announced yesterday that secondary coach Terry Lantz has been elevated from his restricted earnings position to full-time status.

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Set things right with your romantic partner so that you can once again concentrate on work. Those in school need to study harder. You may be falling too far behind to catch up. Get better organized.

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): An elderly person is a source of wisdom. A pregnant friend needs further investigation before you make a decision. Do not be opinionated about issues you care. Look for other ways to express your views.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Influential allies make you the spotlight now. Financial aid is available from an unusual source. Seek an out-of-the-way meeting place; privacy is important.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): You may have to do some hard searching now to find what you need, but it is worthwhile. Someone is trying a heart- to-heart talk will help get a relationship back on track. Maintain a strong attitude.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Paying bills promptly protects your credit rating. Be diligent. Replace outdated methods with helpful new ones. Consult a light- tech expert before buying computers. Working hand- in- glove with partner will boost productivity.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): You may be surprised by what happens today. The final outcome will favor your interests. A secret wish moves closer to being fulfilled. A special talent could bring you a second income. Count your blessings!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Review a financial program and iron out any snags. A conservative approach will bring the largest financial gains. Screw to balance emotional strength with mental clarity. Put romance on hold until certain what you really want.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Interesting encounters are indicated. Be careful not to offend someone. Be thoughtful of your partner's feelings. Your mate is somewhat sensitive right now. Be impressed by but born of a glimmer.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Childish spats can only be resolved by adults. Be willing to compromise. Family problems are puzzling. Look for a way to reconcile estranged relations. Romance is shy.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Talk over a problem with your partner or mate. A candid exchange of views helps you explain your moral values. A social gathering allows you to spread your wings as a social butterfly.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Trust your intuitive perceptions on business. Turn away from eccentric ideas and serve humanity with humility. Your understanding of other people's needs may be equal to a good move. Friends offer good advice. Consider it carefully.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Ignoring warning signals would be a big mistake. Postpone making a major move at work until after the weekend. Take your responsibility seriously. But find time for creative play. A child-related investment pays special dividends.

Minutewomen face No. 16 GW

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

It's the battle for supremacy in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

As it stands right now, George Washington and Massachusetts are at the top of the women's basketball standings at 8-1. That will all change tomorrow when the two teams meet at the William D. Mullins Center at 2 p.m.

The two teams met earlier in the year in Washington D.C. and the Colonial Women came away with the win, 69-60. In that game, the Minutewomen were tied at 53 with just under nine minutes to go before Darlene Saar hit a trey to make it 58-53. From there on, UMass never cut the lead to less than four. Sophomore Crystal Carroll led the Minutewomen with 14 points.

"We lost by nine and it's not like we got killed. We were right in it until the end," sophomore forward Crystal Carroll said. "I think we're right up there and we can play with the best of them."

The Colonial Women (15-4 overall) are led by their two senior All-America candidates Saar and Debbie Hemery. Hemery is leading the team in scoring (20.0) while Saar is leading the team (and the A-10) in rebounding (9.3). Hemory was recently named the A-10 Player of the Week for the fourth time this season.

Another big player for the Colonial Women is sophomore Tajama Abraham, the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year last year. She is averaging 13.6 points and 5.3 rebounds this year while leading the A-10 in blocks.

Rounding out the starting lineup for the Colonial Women should be juniors Lei Sawyers and Myriah Lonergan (an A- 10 third team preseason pick). Coming off the bench will be the tandem of Martha Williams (9.7 ppg and 5.5 rpg) and Colleen McCrea (45 steals).

The Minutewomen will need great inside play from center Melissa Gurile and forwards Octavia Thomas and Carroll, if they want to come away with the win.

Carroll has been playing exceptionally well. In the last five games she has averaged 20.8 points and 8.2 rebounds including a career-high 28-point performance against West Virginia on Feb. 2.

Gurile is leading the team in scoring with 15.3 ppg while Thomas is the leading rebounder with 8.0 rpg. Gurile scored only five points against GW in the first meeting, her season low, while Thomas scored 12.

Beth Kuzmeski (10.2, 37 treys) and Tricia Hopson (51 assists, 19 steals) should be the starting guards with Sabriya Mitchell (88 assists) supplying quickness off the bench.

Freshmen Tez Kraft and Kara Tudman along with junior Nicole Carter, should get quality playing time.

"Saturday's game is a big one in the league and for us to get consideration in the top 20. This is our opportunity," O'Brien said.

This match-up will pit the top two A-10 field goal percentage offenses and defenses against each other. The Minutewomen lead the conference in field goal percentage offense (46.5) and defense (35.4), while the Colonial Women are second in both categories (45.7 offense; 36.6 defense).

George Washington leads the all-time series 18-4 and have won the last four meetings.

On the air: The game will be broadcast on WMUA 91.1 with Ted Kottler on play-by-play and Teri Klein on color.

CHRIS RADUSA / COLLEGIAN
Melissa Gurile will attempt to stop George Washington's sophomore star Tajama Abraham tomorrow afternoon at the Mullins Center.

Minutemen head to the road

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

The always grueling Hockey East schedule presents an extraordinary test for the University of Massachusetts hockey team this weekend.

For the first and only time this season, UMass will be playing consecutive road games against conference opponents on consecutive nights.

The Minutemen (5-20-2, 3-14 in HE) travel to North Andover to take on Merrimack College tonight at 7 p.m. Saturday night, the Minutemen find themselves in Orono taking on a revengeful No. 1 nationally ranked Maine team.

Merrimack was a pre-season selection for eighth, with first-year UMass last. Logically, the Warriors seemed like the opponent the Minutemen would be able to strike first. Well, Maine, Boston College and Providence have fallen to UMass, but not Merrimack.

The Warriors (11-13-5, 4-8-5) came to Amherst on December 2-3, and swept the Minutemen, 4-3 and 5-1. The goaltending of Martin Legault (3.67 goals against average, .897 save percentage) was the difference, with the sophomore registering 77 saves.

As far as Maine goes, two things are not in UMass' favor: the travel and the fact that Maine is waiting for the Minutemen after being upset 4-2 on Jan. 28 in Amherst. Maine goaltender Blair Allison was named Player of the Week, and stands as a candidate for Player of the Year.

Rob Bonneau, shifted to center with Sal Manganaro and Tom Perry, continues to pace the Minutemen offensively. Over his past 11 games, the sophomore forward has scored in all but one, netting 15 (6 goals, 9 assists) points in that span. Bonneau became the first UMass player ever to be named Hockey East Player of the Week, for the week of Jan. 9. Bonneau paces UMass with 11 goals and 12 assists.

Around Hockey East: How good are the Black Bears? After losing to UMass, Shawn Walsh's club remained at No. 1. Heading into the weekend, Maine has a 10-point lead for first place in the conference. Allison (2.60, .891) has been the key in the stretch drive to hold off Boston University for first place. Maine has the edge as they travel away from home just once throughout the rest of the season.

Speaking of the Terriers, Jack Parker has his squad in second with 63 points. Promising sign: senior co-captain defensemen Rich Brennan returned to action last Friday in the 5-1 win over UMass. He had missed six games with a knee injury, as BU has been completely healthy for just one game this season.

New Hampshire is in a battle of their own for third place. Rob Gagnon won Rookie of the Week with four points in two victories. The Wildcats have gotten scoring from their second and third line — scoring depth rivaled only by BU.

Northeastern is four points behind UNH and has been red hot as of late, with three straight blowout victories. NU swept UMass-Lowell 6-1, 8-0 and defeated Merrimack 7-3 this past weekend.

Boston College is next with 40 points, fighting to stay away from the 8-9 game. The Eagles have again reached the finals of the Beanpot. Goaltender Greg Taylor continues to be the star, making over 30 saves in 10 games this season.

One team on the downswing is UMass-Lowell, falling to sixth place. It does not get any easier as road games remain at UNH and Maine (twice). Sniper Greg Bullock is one of college hockey's brightest stars (19-32-51), but a goaltender must be found to stop the slide.

Merrimack stands in at seventh (33 points) and finishes with four of seven on the road. Providence's coach Paul Pooley also has similar problems in goal, despite a powerful offense. Senior Chad Quennville (13-23-36) and Brady Kramer (17-17-34) lead the show for PC.

On the Air: Tonight's game can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM.

UMass set to play Ragin' Cajuns

Three new schools are added to mix in Atlantic 10

By Matt Vautour

Rage in the Cajundome?

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will head south to Lafayette, La., this weekend for a rematch with Southwestern Louisiana that dates back to January 29, 1993. Tipoff is at 4 p.m.

The game was the historical "Final Rage in the Cage," the final men's basketball game played in the Curry Hicks Cage. The Minutemen closed their building in style, beating the Ragin' Cajuns, 84-74.

It has been a tough season so far for Southwestern Louisiana, as the Cajuns have scattered only four victories among their 16 losses.

They lost four seniors (three starters and the first player off the bench) including their starting backcourt of Michael Allen and Byron Starks. The four players accounted for an average of 47.6 points and 10 rebounds per game for Southwestern Louisiana.

Senior center Bryan Collins has been the leader for the Cajuns averaging in double figures in both scoring (10.8 ppg) and rebounding (13.9 ppg).

After Collins, rebounding becomes a problem for the Cajuns, because other than Kelvin Price, there is no player averaging more than 6.8 boards a game.

Atlantic 10 makes expansion official

The Atlantic 10 verified what was reported earlier in the week yesterday as the conference announced that Dayton, LaSalle and Virginia Tech will be joining the A-10 for the 1995-96 season.

The three teams will expand the league to 12 teams. Commissioner Linda Bruno said that the increased number of teams will cause the con-

• The last two games for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team have involved Presidents.

While at the Smith Center in George Washington, President Bill Clinton and daughter mowed on pizza while watching the Minutemen–Colonials contest. And at Rutgers on Feb. 7, had university president Francis Lawrence been attending the Scarlet Knights match-up against Massachusetts, he probably would have gotten pizza thrown at him.

A halfcourt sit–in was done by a Rutgers female student as well as over 150 protesters during halftime, where Rutgers was leading 31-29. Lawrence commented that minorities do not have the genetic background to do well on college entrance exams in November.

The protest that would even make a UMass organization jealous resulted in the suspension of the game, and now the final 20 minutes of action will be played on Mar. 2 at the Palestra in Philadelphia, Pa. just two days prior to the A-10 tournament.

John Calipari said on his WHMP show with George Miller that he went into the Rutgers locker room and told them they played too much of a good game, and they deserved a shot at beating them. He said there was no way this game could end up in a forfeit.

I tell you, boy, I'll stand. For the amazing job he's done with this program since 1988, Calipari does even more through the public relations department. In approximately 22 minutes of airtime, Calipari utilized his time by boosting Rutgers' effort, Joanie O'Brien and the women's basketball team, and the hockey team.

Calipari also noted that his wife, Ellen, and his daughters will be in attendance tomorrow at the Mullins Center for the Minutewomen's clash with George Washington, the top team in the A-10. If you could save me a seat, Mrs. Calipari, I'd be very much obliged.

• The Baltimore Thunder will be taking on the Rochester Night Hawks tomorrow, and it can be seen live on ESPN at 2 p.m. If you want to know what the heck I'm talking about, it is Major Indoor Lacrosse League action. If you are wondering why it is significant, two Massachusetts alums represent each professional team in the game.

The Thunder features former three–time All–American Mark Millon (Class of '93), and former two–time All– American Tim Soudan ('91), who is playing for the Night Hawks.

• Did you know that Southwest Louisiana sophomore guard Barry Bowman's mother Victoria Gay is Jazz on the hit television show American Gladiators?

I certainly hope not.

• In covering the men's hoop team, I have seen my share of interesting crowds. The West Virginia crowd was boisterous, obnoxious and volatile all at the same time, as they belted Massachusetts with plastic cups, vulgarities and Huskies' chants (as in Connecticut Huskies). GW coach Mike Jarvis hit it

West Virginia poses huge challenge for women's gymnastics

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (7–1) faces its greatest challenge yet this season as the Lady Mountaineers of West Virginia (5–2 overall, 2–0 A–10) visit the Curry Hicks Cage Saturday night at 7:30 p.m.

Massachusetts coach Dave Kuzara said that his team is very ready for the challenge.

"We're prepared. Our focus is on ourselves. We hit 23 of our 24 routines on Friday," he said. "That's what our goal is for this weekend. We feel that if we do that, we will have an opportunity to beat West Virginia."

The last meet for both teams was last Friday; against Vermont and MIT. The Minutewomen captured the tri–meet. Junior J.J. Johurst and sophomore Tara Swartz were 1–2, respectively, in the all–around competition.

The Minutewomen want to take a step toward being the next power of the A–10, since this is the last year that West Virginia will compete in the conference. Kuzara is looking for his entire team to step up for the this meet.

"I think everyone has got to step up this weekend," Kuzara said. "Our focus has got to be on the first three people up, not the last three people up. It doesn't matter how well the last two or three people hit, if the first two or three people don't do well. So that has been our focus, and I think that has helped us."

The one change that is sure to help their cause against the Lady Mountaineers will be the return of sophomore Lianne Laing from an ankle injury. With her absence the Minutewomen nearly broke the school record for points in a meet and with her healthy for an all–around performance, the team has reason to be optimistic.

The leadership of senior co–captains Erica Baum (uneven bars) and Stephanie Martino (balance beam) will be looked to for guidance in their respective events. Junior Shahrda Keels will also be a key figure as her floor exercise will be on demonstration for all to see.

"Over the past three weeks we have gone from a team that isn't very consistent, to last weekend being really consistent. If we can maintain that consistency, we're going to be awfully tough," Kuzara said.

West Virginia's team boasts Kristen Quakenbush, an All– American who, as a freshman, put her name in many of the Lady Mountaineer women's gymnastics record books, is possibly the most feared competitor on a very deep West Virginia squad.

This is the beginning of a tough stretch for the Minutewomen, when, after this weekend's meet and a week off, the two teams will square off again in Morgantown, W.Va. Kuzara believes that one of these two meets will be a coming–out party for the team, as both will be hotly contested meets.

"This is part of the growing process, going up against stronger competition," he said. "There will be at least one 10 scored and records are going to go (personal and team). It's going to be that type of meet.

"That's the atmosphere these two teams create ... one team trying to make a name for itself and the other already with that sort of reputation."

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will also be in action in the Cage against Temple. Both meets will take place simultaneously.

White House fights for nominee

■ Henry Foster again subject to questions on abortion history

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House promised a political brawl over its surgeon general nominee yesterday, accusing Republicans of pandering to anti-abortionists and scolding slow-to-help Democratic lawmakers.

"We will fight for this nomination," Chief of Staff Leon Panetta said.

But the GOP pushed its case against Dr. Henry Foster, who performed abortions as an obstetrician-gynecologist and conducted hysterectomies on severely retarded women in the 1960s and 1970s. Republican lawmakers insisted that Foster's having performed abortions wasn't the only issue; they blasted the White House for misleading Congress about his record on abortions and sterilizations.

The White House complicated the matter by telling a key senator that Foster had performed just one abortion. Panetta blamed the mixup partly on allowing the Department of Health and Human Services — not the White House — to conduct the early background check on Foster. "That shouldn't happen," he said.

A week after Foster's selection, reporters learned that he had performed the hysterectomies on retarded women. With support from some independent doctors, the White House argued that the procedure was accepted medical practice at the time.

But the steady drip of revelations gave Republicans the opportunity to oppose the nomination without seeming to wade into the divisive abortion debate.

"This is a litmus test not on abortion. This is a litmus test on the truth," Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind., said yesterday.

Although he objected to the abortions, Quayle emphasized the White House's failure to get Foster's record clear. "They've just basically hung Dr. Foster out to dry," he said.

Black poet makes politics art

By Hernán Rozemberg

"To understand what is happening in a place politically, all you have to do is look at its art," said Reg E. Gaines.

On Jan. 10 Gaines presented his artistic talent, while at the same time describing the politics of the Black community in the United States. Gaines has published two books previously, and is currently working on a third, a collection of poems. He is the poet–in–residence in the New York Public Library and holds multiple kind of workshops on poetry and literature in middle schools of the inner city.

Gaines held 65 listeners spellbound, reciting eight poems and doing some storytelling along the way.

"What is Black? A color? A state of mind?" Gaines tackled head–on the dilemma surrounding the intellectual perspective of releasing oppression from within the mind of the Black individual. As complex and intricate as this may be to demonstrate artistically, Gaines maintained an informal and casual tone that kept the audience attentive and interested.

Among the many topics and issues brought up in the poems recited, Gaines shed some light of stereotypes of Blacks from within the community, displaying the image of the gangsta youth as the dominating one in society today. White America saw this as an opportunity for additional economic profit, and thus marketed and commercialized this stereotype, which White youth bought on to: "You've got your X–cap on, but I got you powerless," said Gaines, as a warning and wake–up call to Black youth.

Yet another subject that Gaines touched upon was the massive and tremendously ignored Black literary tradition, mentioning in a poem names of several Black writers that have either received little or no recognition whatsoever for their talents, such as Charles Hestnut. The latter poem, entitled "To Be Black and Write," spoke of these great minds who used "words as weapons" in the Black struggle for freedom and equality, according to Gaines.

Relating the current interest of the Black community on the spoken or sung word rather than the written word, Gaines said that "we need to make our literature a little more musical," so that the youth can unleash a huge fountain of knowledge that is presently being held back — mostly by external forces — and discredited.

In a showing of honesty and openness, Gaines shared with the audience the fact that he feels he is still maturing as a writer and as a poet, and that he has a long way to go in order to become a great artist.

Gaines spoke of how he has had to amend his personal way of approaching poetry in order for him to be accepted by the rest of society. Gaines said that he has followed traditional and academically–correct style of poetry as a means of proving that Black artists can be just as knowledgeable as their White counterparts.

Additionally, Gaines spoke on the subject of the tone of skin color, and how it has been traditionally the pattern where the lightest the skin, the better person one is. Gaines discussed this polemic in the poem "If She's Darker Than Your Sister, We Don't Need Her In This House."

This has continually created heated discussion in Black circles, said Gaines, because of the influence of White America in enforcing the "White is right" theory. Not only has this taken its toll on Black–White relations in America, but also has created rifts amongst the Black community itself — whereby the light–skinned Blacks were made to be "superior" to darker–skinned ones.

Returning to the involvement of violence in the Black youth in large urban centers, Gaines recited a poem describing the story of an 11–year–old in Chicago who was recently killed, after having been convicted on 23 counts of felonies. He called the poem "Yummy," after the kid's nickname.

Gaines stated his main objective as that of "making people think and be less judgmental." Also, Gaines said that he would be satisfied with his work if "lines of communication were opened up."

The event, "Reg E. Gaines, Urban Storyteller. Poetry in Motion — the Spoken Word," was presented by the Black Student Union and Student Activities Office of Amherst College at the Gerald Penny Cultural Center.

Students fight for higher ed at statehouse

By Marnie Thamel

BOSTON — University of Massachusetts students will fight for improvements in higher education on the statehouse steps this afternoon.

At the press conference, organized by the Student Advisory Council for Massachusetts Public Higher Education, an agenda will be presented to state legislators, listing off students' priorities regarding budgetary issues, according to Christine Lopes, campus organizer for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

"I think the conference will go over well because the issue of funding effects students and their families, high school students, faculty and staff — thousands of people," said Lynn Robitaille, student coordinator of SCERA.

Students from Massachusetts' community colleges, state colleges and universities will gather for the press conference, Lopes said.

They will address such issues as the state budget for higher education, and tuition and fees, according to Lopes.

The agenda is a collaborative effort by 80 Massachusetts students from 20 different schools who met at a two–day conference in January.

"We have come together as one, to fight for higher education as a whole," Lopes said.

Lopes will be attend today's "Education Declaration" conference along with approximately 10 University of Massachusetts students.

Students involved with SCERA and the Student Government Association (SGA) have been contacting state representatives and urging them to attend the conference, Robitaille said.

Some representatives are happy to speak with the students and support the cause, but some don't return calls, Lopes said.

"I have confidence that state legislators will understand

Worker's remarks spark protest in Franklin D.C.

■ 150 students force early closing of dining hall by holding 'stand-in'

By Henry J. Brier and Chris Conner

One of the University of Massachusetts dining commons shut down Friday night because of a "sit–in" conducted by students. The protest was held in response to an alleged racial incident that occurred last Wednesday.

The protest at Franklin Dining Commons resulted in the closing of the entire building, including the D.C. and the Munchie Store. Demonstrators occupied the ramps on either side of the D.C. where students normally wait in line.

"This is not a sit–in," said Taft Bailey, a senior legal studies and business management major. "This is a stand–in. This is Black students standing up for their civil rights."

The University's slow response to the alleged racial incident spurred the demonstration, according to Natasha Springer, a junior bachelor's degree with individual concentration major.

The alleged victim, African–American sophomore Ronald Dottin, an economics major, described the incident in a letter sent to different activist groups, UMass administrators and media organizations.

Both Chancellor David K. Scott and Richard Rossi, director of food services, have sent letters of apology to Dottin, according to Karin Sherbin, spokesperson for the UMass News Office.

According to Dottin's account, he audibly recited "eeny meeny miny moe" while selecting his dinner meal. It was then that Emily Tozloski, a University Food Services staff member, looked Dottin in the eye and responded, "Catch a nigger by the toe."

"I was immediately shocked into a state of disbelief," Dottin wrote.

The letter, addressed to Scott, was sent to the Amherst Chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Cultured People (NAACP), the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination (MCAD) and the state representative from Dottin's hometown.

Tozloski, 73, has been indefinitely suspended, and it is unknown whether or not she is receiving pay, according to Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services.

Dottin demanded to fill out an official complaint form with the D.C. manager immediately following the incident.

The first to speak to Dottin was a night supervisor, Diane Flynn, who apologized for the employee's slur. According to Dottin's account, Flynn attempted to downplay the serious nature of the remark.

"She waved me off," Dottin said, describing Flynn's treatment of the issue.

Flynn then went to retrieve the appropriate complaint forms and returned with Marian Whalen, the manager on duty.

While Dottin discussed the incident with Whalen, Flynn retrieved Tozloski, who apologized. Yet Dottin questioned her sincerity, according to his account.

"Her apology was saturated with derogatory remarks and racial undertones," Dottin wrote in the letter.

Flynn and Whalen were satisfied with Tozloski's retraction and said they accepted it as a "sufficient solution to the problem," Dottin wrote.

Yet, Flynn expressed concern over the event's possible repercussions, fearing that an uproar comparable to last week's halftime protest at the UMass–Rutgers University basketball game might ensue, according to Dottin.

"Eeny meeny miny moe, Emily has got to go," chanted the predominantly African–American protesters who gathered at Franklin on Friday at 4 p.m., the time at which

Mideast talks continue with Clinton's help

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As President Clinton intervened to bolster Mideast peace talks, Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization pledged yesterday to overcome their stalemate and proceed with expanded Palestinian self–rule on the West Bank. The pledge was taken by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Nabil Shaath, an advisor to PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, at an unannounced meeting with Secretary of State Warren Christopher, who then disclosed the results at the White House.

"Both made clear that there would be no turning back from the search for peace," said Christopher. "Both expressed their determination to work together to overcome the challenges that the Israelis and the Palestinians currently face."

He tempered his remarks, however, to say no one was under any "illusion" that there would not be difficulty concluding this phase of the Israel-PLO self–rule agreement.

"We are at a critical moment in the peace process," Clinton said as he presided at a meeting of the Israeli, Jordanian and Egyptian foreign ministers and Shaath of the PLO at Blair House. "What we have to do now is to have specific achievements, lasting achievements," Clinton said.

The three–hour meeting produced an agreement to establish new industrial free–trade zones in the region, and the president said he would clear the way for exports from those zones to enter the United States duty–free.

A joint communique issued at the end of the meeting said, "There can be no real peace in the region without security and stability."

Negotiations between Israel and the PLO have ground to a standstill over in a wave of attacks by Muslim fundamentalists and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's decision to seal off Gaza, the origin of much of the violence.

Christopher acknowledged that the one–day meeting did not provide a solution. "There was no understanding or conclusion reached on that subject," he said at a news conference.

However, Christopher reported a productive three–way meeting with Peres and Shaath before the Blair House talks.

He said the Palestinians had promised "to preempt terror" and Israel to promptly negotiate redeployment of its troops and to hold elections among the Palestinians.
